ERRATA.

It is regretted that the three following do not appear in the text.

- (a) A letter from the Prior of Bath to Cromwell, dated 7 Feb. 1537, giving an annuity of £5, thanking Cromwell for his goodness 'ageynst the preuye and secrett synistre labour' made against the Prior, and asking that the brethren might have such liberty for recreation as the Glastonbury monks had. (R. O. Letts. and Papers Hen. VIII. XII. 360.)
- (b) From Nicolas' proceedings of the Privy Council VII. 169, it appears that John Hillary a monk of Keynsham was committed to the Marshalsea, 7 April, 1541, because it was asserted that he had falsely accused the Chancellor of the Court of Augmentations.
- (c) In Acts of the Privy Council, 1547—50, p. 97, there is an interesting regulation as to the payment of pensions to dispossessed monks (9 June, 1547). It provides that where possible the monks shall come to the Treasurer of the Court of Augmentations (no longer to the particular receiver) in person 'to be viewed whither they were the same persones to whome suche pencions were assigned.' If they cannot come in person they are to send a certificate, signed by two Justices or one Justice and a gentleman of reputation in the county, saying that the rightful person still lives there. This regulation is based in its preamble upon a fear of fraud, and refers to the Carthusians who had passed the sea and yet deputed friends to draw their pensions.

CHAPTER I.

THE SOMERSET HOUSES AND THEIR SUPPRESSION.

IT is worthy of remark that the suppression of The dissolution. the religious houses in England, though accomplished with marvellous rapidity, whether we consider the importance of the change itself or the magnitude of the interests involved, was not effected at a blow. In fact the dissolution was spread out over a period of some fifteen years, a point which ought not to be lost sight of, as even that length of time probably gave such opportunity for preparation as prevented the shock being felt in all its force. But the statement that this great economic change was made rapidly only implies that the movement towards it had been slowly gathering force underground long before it appeared on the surface.

The legality of the acts of Henry or his ministers Precedents for suppression. in the matter does not seem to have been doubted; perhaps because there had been many precedents for suppression¹. These again were evidence of the public opinion, at all events of the middle classes, on the subject. A papal bull had, it is true enough, always been thought necessary to license any interference with the orders; and with such Wolsey had fortified himself in diverting some portion of monastic revenues to the purposes of education¹, some years before the general dissolution of the smaller houses. But all suppressions which occurred previously to 1536 were of an entirely different character from those whose effects form the matter of this enquiry. They were grounded on the uselessness or bad conduct of certain small houses in Wolsey's case; and in the notable instance of the alien priories under Edward III. as on strong patriotic or economic contentions; they were moreover justified by a fairly unselfish disposition of the proceeds². The causes which rendered the dissolution possible is a subject far too wide for discussion here³. It may suffice to say that unconscious advantage was taken of a general anti-monastic tendency in the middle and upper classes, to which must of course be added causes to be found in the state of the houses themselves and in their relation to the general social advancement of

³ The whole subject of the English dissolution is treated in the article in the Home and Foreign Review before referred to; at length, in Dixon's History of the Church of England, and later in Gasquet's Henry VIII. and the English Monasteries. That the general history has been so thoroughly treated by these and so many other writers must be the present writer's excuse for merely glancing at it.

England. There had certainly been a decline in the position of the houses, or rather they had not advanced with the rest of the kingdom. The larger had absorbed the smaller; the difficulties of wealthy absenteeism had been introduced; the old superiority of monastic agriculture was waning; monasteries were often subjected to petty annoyances by their neighbours. Their importance in a word had declined. Still one writer¹ thinks that as much money was left to the orders in the 14th and 15th centuries as before: but it certainly was distributed among fewer corporations; only some 700 were left, it seems certain, in Cromwell's time as compared with 1200 of three centuries before².

This question of the possibility of the dissolution makes prominent the helplessness of the lower classes, with whom the monks were popular. It also, if it is to be answered, involves some investigation of the relations between landlord and tenant, in which it may be stated that the monks were conservative and easy-going, though with important exceptions. This will be glanced at in a later chapter.

It is to be feared that the suppressions under Cromwell had different motives than the wish for reform. There seems some analogy to the Templars' case; the agents at all events were equally vile and untrustworthy. Any candid reader of the Visitors' Reports or what is left of them, without having any particular theory to support, will be reminded of the fable of the wolf and the lamb; it certainly seems

pression.*

as if the visitation had been undertaken to secure the suppression. Still it must be repeated that, as far as can be said of any act under the Tudors, the dissolution of the monasteries was ultimately a national act, distinctly authorized and again and again confirmed by both Houses of Parliament. This curious fact, though it may be only true of the upper and middle classes, cannot be explained by the theory of a temporary blaze of fanaticism.

Visitation.*

The general visitation of the houses which began in October 1535 was intimately connected with the royal supremacy, indeed Cromwell's appointment as vicar-general has been described by Canon Dixon as the putting of the new royal powers into commission. Visitations there had been before, but they had been episcopal and local; such had been Morton's visitation of St Alban's Abbey in 1487 or Wareham's efforts in 1511. Wolsey's visitation of 1523 had not much wider effects than these, or even aims. In the same year as the general visitation began, Cranmer also conducted a similar enquiry in his own province, but had to give way after some conflict had arisen¹.

It is probable that Cromwell had in 1535 designed a partial suppression. At all events it is difficult to read the letters of the visitors in any other sense².

² Lingard, v. p. 53, -says that the dissolution was foretold at the time of Wolsey's fall.

That destruction was in the air is manifest from the Act forbidding new foundations as early as 21 Hen. VIII. The absurd notions of the wealth of the orders were spread far and wide by Fish¹; what that wealth actually was might henceforth be known from the Valor Ecclesiasticus, a survey of the ecclesiastical property whose accuracy has been very generally admitted² although it was necessarily not complete. The multitude of local surveys shews that it was felt to be imperfect, or at all events not to have been universally relied on in the years following the suppression.

The "English reign of terror," as Green picturesquely calls it, began with the reign of Cromwell, Thomas Cromwell. whose wonderful character cannot be denied a great superiority in the art of management; a man with more scruples would have been swept away in a moment. As things went in the sixteenth century he was not wanting in humanity. Like the Borgias he had certain objects to achieve, and if their attainment involved a certain number of executions, it was part of a system of policy; he seems from his letters to have generally cared little about ways and means. But if his conduct in the suppression times, and particularly when the northern rebellion was at its height, be considered it will be idle to deny him supreme ability. His industry, as can be gathered from his correspondence, was enormous. His avarice is perhaps doubtful, though there is some excuse, in spite of Green's explanation, for thinking that he was avaricious. The visitors at all events seem to have thought so.

² See Hardy in the Pref. to the published edition of 1810.

*Henry
VIII.*

Henry, whose new position seemed a satire on the Protestant doctrine of the sanctity of individual opinion, had many reasons for disliking the monks. They were possessed of a certain amount of property, and he was always in need. He was masterful and popular, and found in the orders great opposition to his royal supremacy. His opinions must have varied from time to time, just as his position varied with regard to dogma. At one time he seems to have contemplated partial suppression only. Guided by Cromwell he felt his way as time went on, but the strength of his passions made him uncertain. It was very difficult for people in remote parts of England to keep up with him, though they seem to have tried their best.

The general visitation was conducted by Legh, Layton, Ap Rice, Gage, Bellasis, London and Sowell¹. Of these we hear most of Legh and Layton, who paid two visits to Somerset. What manner of men, it may be asked, were Cromwell's deputies? It will suffice to speak of Legh and Layton.

Thomas Legh was young, fresh from Eton and King's College, Cambridge, and if we may trust the account of Ap Rice² 'of intolerable elation of mind.' He was a Doctor of Laws and a great favourite with Cromwell, in spite of all attempts to undermine his influence; the surest method of estimating the value of his testimony will be by reading the correspondence which follows. The result will probably be that he must be considered to be a pushing, vigorous man with no scruples whatever, ready to do what his master wished and very quick at perceiving what his master did wish, more so than Layton. His reward was large. He was made a Master in Chancery. Three monastic sites were made over to him and he was knighted¹, but his conduct at Sherburn Hospital², of which he was appointed master in 1535, shews that he was a hard cruel man, as indeed does his other conduct. Legh died in 1545³. Richard Layton says that he would never have been more than a basket-bearer but for his master's fostering care⁴. Unfortunately his career also was not such as to have deserved all the patronage he obtained⁵. As he practised like Legh in the Ecclesiastical Courts their names occur frequently together; and both are found in the "Calendars of Letters and Papers." Layton's 'sprightliness,' which makes his letters very readable, does not seem to have been suited to the duties he had to perform, or to have stood him in better stead than Legh's "satrapike countenance." Both were unpopular, as may be seen from their lives being demanded by the Pilgrims of Grace. Clerical benefices were showered upon Layton's head: he was rector of Stepney, held the livings of St Faith's and Harrow, from the latter of which he wrote many of his letters; he was also prebendary of Kentish Town, dean of Chester-le-Street, archdeacon of Bucks, and finally retired in 1539 to the Deanery of York. While in the enjoyment of the last he appears to have made away with some of the church plate. He died at Brussels in 1544. The value of his evidence may be gauged from letter x.

These two with Tregonwell and Petre were concerned with Somerset. The visitation in both cases was but an incident in a busy life of a discreditable kind. Both were probably on the swearing commission, as Canon Dixon calls it; Legh assisted at the trial of Anne Boleyn, and afterwards had the credit of solving the Canterbury plot¹; Layton was one of the divines who enquired into the validity of Henry's marriage with Anne of Cleves. Fuller² has summed up the matter in language which most people will agree with:—

“By this time [he says], the Instruments employed by the Lord Cromwell, to make discovery of the vitious lives of Monks, and Fryers, were all returned in their persons, or in their intelligence sent unto him. They were men, who well understood the message they went on, and would not come back without a satisfactory answer to him that sent them, knowing themselves were likely to be no losers thereby. And now they had found out water enough to drive the mill, (besides what ran by) a sufficient detection to effect the businesse. Of these, some were put in commission to visit Abbeys, others moving in a lower, (but no lesse needfull) sphere of activity.

“Of these Commissioners the principal were Rich, Layton, Tho. Legh, William Peters, Doctors of the law; Doctor John London, Dean of Wallingford. Of the three former I can say nothing, but finde the later (though imployed to correct others) no great saint himself. For afterwards he was publickly convicted of perjury, and adjudged to ride with his face to the Horse-tale at Windsor and Ockingham with papers about his head, which was done accordingly¹."

It must be remembered that Fuller on the whole is unfavourable to the monks, as may be judged from his heading one of his sections "The generalitie of monasteries notoriously vitious."

A great part of England was traversed before February, 1536, when parliament, the parliament which dissolved the lesser monasteries, met. There seems to have been a regular scheme of visitation, as we gather from the instructions which were drawn up for the guidance of the visitors². They may have followed these, but it is hardly reasonable to suppose that they did³. Their attention was concentrated on property, sexual offences, and what was roughly termed superstition. A list of monks who confessed to certain crimes, or were considered as guilty, was made out but it has in great part disappeared⁴; from it the celebrated Black Book is said to have been compiled. The matter is not free from doubt but it need not concern anyone who is dealing with a single county; what we have to do with is the evidence which remains. This is contained in a great number of letters by which the visitors from time to time advised Cromwell of their proceedings, most of them being preserved in the Record Office, but some among the Cotton. MSS. at the British Museum. From these letters it appears that a good deal of financial business of an underhand character was transacted, as indeed will appear later, for which the deputies had every facility, in that one of the functions given them in their commission was that of enquiring into the repairs of the fabrics and similar matters of property.

*The Act of 27 Hen.
VIII.*

Whether on good or bad evidence the Act of 27 Hen. VIII. was passed, giving to the king all the houses of a less yearly value than two hundred pounds. The stories as to the scenes in the debate in parliament must be received with suspicion; it was certainly a packed assembly¹ and careless of anything beyond the private interests of its members. There can have been no idea prevalent as to the political possibilities of the move, and once done it was fortunate for this country that Henry was ignorant of them also or too extravagant to take advantage of his position. With the fall of the lesser monasteries ends the first stage of the dissolution. Three hundred and seventy² houses or thereabouts were placed at the king's disposal. To administer their property the Court of Augmentations was created, which controlled an army of officials in various parts of the country.

The general dissatisfaction which these suppressions produced found emphatic expression in the northern rising, and in a spirit of disaffection so universal as to force more moderate measures on the king. Even before the northern rising the commissions of visitation were altered¹ and new men of higher character, at all events of local influence, were added. Unfortunately only a small part of the new commissioners' report remains; but it probably did not give satisfaction, as in three counties at all events they could but mention one house requiring suppression². The old kind of visitation was renewed. The greater houses, in addition to the annoyance this entailed, were burdened with the support of monks distributed among them after the fall of the lesser. They were harassed and bullied and robbed, but that by this time every thinking man knew what was intended is clear from a remark of the Bishop of London quoted by Burnet³. It is only fair to the monks to remember how much a man will confess to when he is thoroughly frightened; and where fright would not produce evidence which Layton thought to be enough bribery was freely resorted to.

Suppression had proceeded throughout 1536; but the fall of the greater monasteries was gently and easily introduced after the quelling of the northern rebellion⁴ which the northern foundations had favoured. Many were attainted; more went through the form of a free surrender⁵. All the houses in

Chantries, Guilds &c.*

The Church had now, if we include the annates, given up well-nigh all she had to give. An amount of property which if capitalized and reduced to our values has been estimated at forty or fifty million pounds¹ had passed into, and in great part out of, the king's hands. But the authority which had ripped the lead off the roofs of the finest buildings in the land for sale as old metal was not likely to be satisfied while there remained anything worth taking even in quasi-monastic hands. The third series of confiscations which the Church endured was far less Wells; App. II., Eighth Report of the Dep. Keeper of the Pub. Records. As to the form two specimens from the Record Office are appended to this chapter.

¹ This is obtained from Blunt's estimate of the then value and Gasquet's idea of the comparison between the value in Henry VIII.'s time and our own; one, the latter thinks, being about one-tenth of the other. But this is not quite certain. Some even say that one-twentieth would be nearer the mark (Green, Pref. to Som. Chantries). After all it is best to say with Prof. J. Thorold Rogers (J. of the Statis. Soc. xxiv. p. 541), that it is difficult to estimate the value of land in the xvth century in terms of our own time. We know how much pasture and arable fields brought in various places per acre from the Rental, but so many considerations ought to be added, as they would have to be to-day, that this really brings one very little nearer. Speaking generally of values Browne Willis (Mitred Abbeys, I. p. 109 note) multiplies by 20, Oldmixon by 10 (p. 92), to bring them up to their respective times. Obviously the former was an exaggerated view of the purchasing power of money. The confusion existing on the subject is marked by the difference of opinion as to the sufficiency of the pensions, but it is significant to note that the scheme for the future ordering of convents (one of many which remained untried) contained in Cleop. E. iv. of the Cotton MSS. fixes 40/- and diet as the annual provision for a monk.

justifiable than either of the two previous ones. It struck more cruelly at the comfort of the lower classes, and it was, in spite of all the guarding which the statute provided, a mighty inroad on private property.

Henry's life was not long enough to enable him to see the completion of his work by the ruin of the chantries and guilds; but an Act was passed just before his death appointing commissioners to enquire into their property in each county and to make a report. This commission came to nothing or practically so, and the part of the statute that vested all their possessions in the king was not put into general operation. The matter was in fact taken up afresh in the first year of king Edward VI.

The Valor of 27 Hen. VIII. had only very partially included chantries¹ and had not included colleges, guilds, fraternities, &c. at all. It appears that forewarned the owners of the smaller foundations began to sell and dispose of them in Henry's time and were only stopped by an Act of 1545. The commission which Henry appointed for Somerset and Dorset consisted of the Bishops of Bath and Bristol, Sir Giles Strangewaye more notably a Dorset than a Somerset man, Sir John Horsey, member of a very ancient border Somerset family from the Yetminster district, Thos. Denam, Esq., Robert Carye, Gent., of the Castle Cary family, really a branch of the Carews, Roger Kentsey, gent.¹. Such was the position of affairs at Henry's death.

Green has pointed out² the difference in point of view of the two Acts. That of the last year of Henry's reign based the dissolution of the chantries upon little beyond the fact of their being rich. The framers of the Act of 1 Edward VI. dwelt upon the religious side of the matter, denouncing them as the homes of superstition and making assertions amounting to promises as to education, and the care of the poor and preaching. Edward's Act appointed a new commission. The men for Somerset and Dorset were Thos. Speke, Hugh Poulett, John Rogers, John Seyntlow and Thos. Dyer, Kts., with Wm Moryce, Geo. Lyne, Rob. Keylway, Rob. Metcalff, John Hannan and Wm Hartegyll³; names which shew that the chief families of the county did not hold back from the Government's proceedings. These men were the authors of the famous Survey and Rental, a complete valuation of Somerset chantry property, to which they added notes as to the character of priests, number of communicants and church accommodation in various places. Frequent reference will be made to this report hereafter.

Such in brief is the general history of the dissolution. We must now turn more particularly to Somerset. The lists which follow will shew how very rich, considering its size and small importance, Somerset was in foundations of every sort. Not only were they numerous, but they were very valuable; and not only were the revenues of the houses large, but the convents were in possession of buildings of extraordinary beauty. If the scanty remains of Cleeve, Glastonbury and Muchelney be examined with care some faint idea, but only a faint one, may be obtained how they must have improved the general aspect of the already beautiful county which contained them. Somerset at the dissolution had not only all those stately perpendicular towers for which it is so famous, but it was full of fine monastic buildings, of many of which no trace beyond a barn perhaps remains but which together with the fifteenth century houses in so many manors must have greatly added to the pleasantness and character of the county¹.

The first list which follows contains the names and revenues of the Greater Houses according to the division made by the Act of 27 Henry VIII. It is taken from the Valor Ecclesiasticus, "the Domesday of the Church," a valuation made of all the ecclesiastical property in England in order that the revenue derived from the annates which had been transferred

Some discrepancy may be found in the accounts of the houses and their values. Some are necessarily taken from other sources than the Valor. Many writers have relied on Speed; others on a list which occurs in the Cotton. MSS¹. The best authority is the Roll in the Augmentation Office, of which the latter is only a copy. Sometimes again the ministers' accounts are followed; and as they are of later date than the Valor there is some difference, and as time goes on and we get near the end of Henry VIII. a great difference, in the revenues.

If we only multiply these incomes by ten, which is certainly not sufficient when money has to be considered in relation to subsistence, it will be seen from our own standard how very valuable these greater monasteries were. It is really very difficult to understand the influence and position of a community such as Glastonbury, living in a small and out of the world town¹, at the same time enjoying a revenue of more than £30,000 per annum. Perhaps this is even more forcibly brought home to us by trying to consider life at Muchelney and Montacute.

The next list, also from the Valor, contains the lesser houses, those that is to say with a rental below two hundred pounds. It will be noted that neither of these lists includes Bristol, which to begin with was only partially in Somerset, and further belonged to another ecclesiastical jurisdiction.

² Of the following, Bath Hospital was not dissolved, but after various fortunes was handed over to the Mayor and Corporation. See Bath Field Club Proceedings, vol. II. p. 106. The writer of this account whoever he may have been was not an accurate copyist, for he has missed out Northumberland which had 12 foundations¹. Somerset is returned with 23 houses because he includes both Maunde Roy and the Hospital of St Katherine, Bedminster. However the column is sufficiently near the truth to serve as an illustration of the remark that Somerset was very rich in monasteries and that the individual societies were possessed of large revenues.

It would take a small volume to enumerate correctly the Colleges, Chantries, fraternities &c. that were suppressed by the Act of 1 Edw. VI., but the following is a summary of them by Deaneries¹.

Here again it must be remarked that no account is taken of anything but rents or rent-charges, none for instance of profit from cattle which were often left for the support of obytes, anniversaries and so forth.

Taking all income together we have a sum of something over eight thousand pounds a year to be dealt with. How that and the plate, buildings and ornaments as well as other miscellaneous property was distributed will form the subject of a later chapter.

The important question which will occur to the reader as to the condition and usefulness of all these foundations will be answered indirectly rather than directly in this Essay. The letters which follow must be studied by any who would form an opinion. They are all quoted in full. Here a word or two must suffice.

Athelney, Muchelney and Bath it will be seen were in temporary financial difficulties. But what of the other charges against the monasteries? The visitors would make nothing out of Glastonbury as may be seen from letter X.¹ while we have only an unsupported statement as to Bath in the record of the whole county. On the other hand, no one can doubt from the correspondence that Athelney, Glastonbury, Henton and Montacute were well ordered. The generally high tone of the district is evidenced by the capital that has to be made out of the petty superstition at Bruton. The examination of the monk at Bruton is not without value as shewing the pressure brought to bear on the convents, the desire to find the heads involved in some irregularity, with the purpose of letting them off with the surrender of their houses.

A good deal of light too is thrown by the letters on the profits made by the visitors and their master, but the evidence here is even with Ap Rice's letter in regard to Legh, hopelessly incomplete. The profits were gathered openly and in secret over the whole kingdom. Money, jewels, petty offices, corrodies, leases at 'convenient rentals,' anything in fact with a value would do for the crew of adventurers who wandered over the country. The following from Mr Gairdner's abstracts may be added as an instance of Cromwell's part in the matter, though it must be confessed that it is a bad instance, and away from Somerset.

LEGH TO CROMWELL.

There is a priory of Byggyn in Fordham Norwich diocese where is but the prior and an aged monk at deaths door. The Earl of Northumberland is founder from whom Cromwell may easily obtain his title and interest. It is a proper house having £30 a year in temporal lands besides a benefice of £16 a year. Asks what shall be done¹.

As may be seen from letter IV. from Legh, the visitors if they served a common master did not by any means agree. Legh himself afterwards got into trouble and was reproved by Cromwell. The letter of Ap Rice which is given does not by itself stand alone, it is however sufficiently suggestive of the disloyalty and scheming malice which were characteristics of Cromwell's creatures². Some of the letters dwell upon a very disagreeable result of the visitation, the complete incarceration of the monks and heads of houses in the monasteries¹, a politic provision bringing pressure upon the unfortunate prisoners and calculated to induce them to resign.

¹ Gairdner ix. 735; see also no. 478; Cott. MSS.; Cleop. E. iv. p. 127; and the particulars for grants of each month.

The inferences to be drawn from the scanty evidence which remains have been disputed from the Reformation until the present day. On the one hand we have Mr Thorold Rogers², who says that the monasteries would deserve their fate if a part only of what was reported were true; with him Mr Froude; on the other Father Gasquet and the Catholic historians³. Without going so far as to maintain that things would not be so very bad even if all the Compters were accurate it must be confessed that this remark is perfectly true as far as Somerset is concerned. Of other counties the same few (very few) 'stale indecencies' have been repeated in the sixteenth, seventeenth, eighteenth, and nineteenth centuries, few examining closely into the motives of either the visitors or their master; most treating the whole as Fuller does, too much as a matter passed and unimportant, even as amusing. Still, as a great many moderate historians may be found to confess, as Fuller seems to confess, that the mode of suppression was abominable; that the conduct of the Government was inhuman, of the monks if the times be considered, at worst human. It must be admitted that every possible inducement existed to lead Legh and Layton to blacken the character of the monks. It must also be admitted that if what we read be a fair sample of the rest of the houses in the county, on the whole in Somerset they were singularly unsuccessful.

² Six Centuries of Work and Wages, p. 338.

Future chapters will shew to some extent what became of the monastic property, but its distribution does not suggest, any more than the rest of what is really known of Henry's character, any peculiar regard for what was holy in the king himself. Judge, jury, bar and witnesses were all by interest hostile, while the prisoner was browbeaten and terrified. Is it any wonder then that in the first place the possessions were confiscated and squandered, or that in the second a justification was patched up, partly based upon the confessions of the monks themselves?

But in saying that the suppression was unjustly carried out no one will be understood to imply that in the end it may not have been for the benefit of the nation, and that although it were the cause of much temporary and local distress.

Before adding the letters we must give a glance at the chantry priests who were pensioned off in the beginning of Edward VI. What character did they bear amongst their neighbours? In answering this question there is fortunately the best authority to stand by. The Commissioners who went their circuit in pursuance of the dissolving Act were not likely to err on the side of leniency, and in inspecting the property of the guilds, fraternities, &c. they frequently reported something as to the character of the officiating priests. On the whole the report is favourable. Two absentee scholars and three 'gentlemen', taken with one case of dishonesty at Frome-Selwood form the category of whatever is objectionable. As Mr Green¹ says, the usual report, "Of honest conversation but indifferently learned," has a good ring about it. Where no report at all is made it must be concluded that the incumbent's character was satisfactory. Let it be remembered that there were at least 100 chantry priests in the county.

The illustrations² which follow are selected from various parts of the county and are made fairly numerous as the authority for them is not very accessible³.

The above give a very favourable view of the chantry priests. There was no suspicion of immorality breathed against them, though the fact of their having a sufficient income, usually about five or six pounds, and but little in many places to do, and further their living in the sight of all men, exposed them to all the gossip of a little country village. Surely none were more likely to be ill reported of if occasion arose. That the report then is as clear as it is from scandal is no bad testimonial to their worth.

The letters which follow are all that could be found after a careful search through the fifty-two volumes of the Cromwell correspondence in the Record Office, and through other collections as indicated. All that is to say concerning Somerset and the subject of this volume. As many have not been printed before and few in full, they are all given at length and as far as I was able, as they stand. The miscellaneous papers as yet uncalendared for 1538 and 1539 were also gone through, though as to the former year without result. Mr Gairdner very kindly searched for letters in the names of Legh, Layton, and Tregonwell in his index to the forthcoming volume of Letters and Papers for 1537, but also without result. It may be of local interest to state that in vol. 46 of the Cromwell Correspondence there are some letters from the Dean and Chapter of Wells; but they would be out of place here.

Time was wanting to make more than the roughest attempt at arrangement in order of date. Probably if more had been done in this way it would have been unsatisfactory, as the minutest knowledge of the period is required for such an undertaking. Even Canon Dixon's scheme of the visitation is not complete¹. He points out indeed that at one time there were five different visitations proceeding at the same time.

LEGH TO CROMWELL.

After dewe commendations. please it yo^r maistershipp to be aduertised that when according to the kinges graces pleasure and yo^r mynde I visiting certayn monasteries gave iniunction and commaundment that not only the conuent but the Abbot Prior or hed shuld not go furth of the precinct of their howse without speciall licence of the kinges hieghnes or of yo^r maistershipp, maister Docto^r Layton hath not lykewise donne the same, but lefft that to be orderid

they and their chaplayns wherevpon suche as I have visited think that I am to rigorose to bynde theym harder then other men be. wherein I did nothing but vppon the kinges pleasure and yo^rs, well considering that inasmuch as both the heddes and members haue professid one religion, that they shulde be lyke in strayghtnes orderid. doying this also because they might the more knowe the kinges supreme ecchiasticall power in seking to his grace or yo^r maistershipp for relieff herein. Therefore because it is very necessary that a conformitie be amonges vs yo^r ministers, it may please yo^r maistershipp other to send to Docto^r Layton that he geve not only where he shall go but also where he hath been lyke iniunction, or to me that I may release suych as be bounden by the said commaundment. Also inasmuche as in ower procedinges in this hys busynes, it is very necessary & conuenient that all thinges be donne substantially, it is mete that no man shewe hym self to be the kinges commissioner or yo^rs, without a speciall commission in writing. and that these matters be not rasshely donne. for the olde saying is, sat cito si sat bene. for Mr Layton visited here at bruton shewing no commission. and spedely finished his busynes as yo^r maistershipp may perceyve at his commyng to you if ye call for the compertes and professions taken by hym. Aduertising also yo^r maistershipp that where I had bruton in my commission, at my comyng thither the abbot littel regarding the authoritie committed to me, with sharpe and quyk aunsweris said that if I wold of newe visite they, it shuld be but a very undoyng of all Abbotes and monasteries. and otherwyse shewid hym self very haulte and obstinate. Whereuppon I wold desire yo^r maistership ether to loke yo^rself, or else to suffer me to execute my commission towardes hym, as I may answer vppon my perill.

ffrom Bruton xxiiij daie of August.

Also mr Docto^r Layton hath not disuestied suych as be vnder the age of xxiiij yeres from their religion.

bounde to the firste too articles it schuld muche disapoynt the order of the howse whiche hathe longe ben full honorable. Wherefore if it may pleas yo^r said gode Masterschipp to licence the Abbot to dispence w^t thoo too firste Articles yn my mynde ye schall doo a verie gode dede and I dare be suertie he will dispence w^t none but w^t suche as schalbe necessarie, and to the thirde Article they haue vsed all way is make ther leesses by on of the Religious and Cecular men Appoynted to hym. whiche leesses haue commonly be made at a Courte and letten by copie of the Courte Roll and the Covent neuer made previe to the leese and if they schuld make no leese but by assent of the more parte of the Covent it schuld be verie tedyous bothe to them and to ther tennanttes. Wherefore if it may pleas yo^r gode Mastorschipp to discharge that thirde article the abbot weer muche bounde to yo^r gode masterschipp. And to the 111th article peraventure there be sune of his brodirs wuld be gladd to be abroad and to make vntrew surmyse so the Abbot may paye for ther costes. Wherefore if it may pleas yow to ordre that clawse to be spared to tyme the Abbot may wayte on yo^r gode masterschipp the next terme or elles to make it if the complaynunt prove his complaynt to be trew than to haue his costes or elles not the Abbot weer muche bounde to yowe. Other articles ther be whiche they thinke verie strayt how be it they will sue to yo^r gode masterschipp ffor that at more leysor and yn the meane tyme I dowte not they will keep as gode Religyon as any howse of that order w^tyn this Realme as knowith god who long presue yo^r saide gode masterschipp at Redliche the 17^{de} day of Septembre yo^r humble daylie orato^r as he is most bownden.

JOHN AP RICE TO CROMWELL.

After my due and right humble commendacions Please it yo^r m^rship to be aduertised that I haue this daie receued yo^r Lettres by the which I doo perceaue that ye are not content with me for that I have not reuealed vnto you M^r Docto^r Leghes demeano^r proceedinges & maner of going. S^r although I were diuers tymes mynded to be in hande with yo^r m^rship for certain abuses & excesses which I saw in the same. as I thought it my duetie. yet diuers causes did discourage and retracte me from so doing. ffirste I sawe howe litle the complayntes of other as of thabbot of Brueton where he vsed hymself, me thought, very insolentlie did succede at yo^r handes and thinking that his demeano^r at Bradstok Stanley and Edington where he made no lesse ruffling with the heddes than he did at Brueton shulde of all lykelyhood come likewise to yo^r knowlege and yet sawe nothing said vnto hym therfor. And also that supposyng that you considering howe he was one of theym that depraued me heretofore with yo^r m^rship. for no iuste cause but for displeasure which he haue towardes me for certain causes which I will declare vnto you at more leysure. Wolde haue thought all my reaporte by hym to procede of malice. And therfor because I wolde that the matier shulde haue come to yo^r eares rather of other men than of me. I spake of certain his abuses to diuers of my companions nyghe about you, and called diuers of my ffellowes yo^r seruautes at London to come with me and see all his procedinges gesture and maner of going then at Westminster and at Powlles. And myself being hyndered with you not long agoo was affrayed to attempt suche an enterprise with you not being comaunded by you afore so to do | leste he with his bolde excuse wherein he is I adsure you very redy, wolde haue ouercome me being but of small audactie specially in accusations wherunto I am nothing propense of nature though the matier were never so trewe. I can *perceau*e by some that ye woll truste that I wolde haue shewed you his demean^r but for that I was afrayed that ye wolde haue taken it to procede of malice. I loked allways whan ye shulde haue comaunded me to shewe you that. for many tymes it happeneth that a man intending but well hath incurred displeasure by doing his duetie. Also I am fearefull. I am not eloquent in accusations as some men be but nowe that ye comaunde me I dare boldly declare vnto you that I thinke to be amysse in the said m^r Doct^r and what I require in hym.

ffirste. in his going he is too insolent & pompalique which because he went so at London in the face of all the worlde I thought ye had knowen. and afore yo^r owne fface many tymes. Than he handleth the ffathers where he cometh very roughly and many tymes for small causes as thabbotes of Brueton, & Stanley, & m^r of Edington for not meting of hym at the doore where they had no warnyng of his comyng. Also I require more modestie, grauitie and affabilitie which wolde purchase hym more reuerence than his owne setting foorth and satrapike countenance.

The man is yong and of intolerable elation of mynd.

As concernyng his taking I think it excessive in many thinges.

first for the election of the Po^r of Coventrie he toke xv^{li} for the election lately at Bevall, the charterhouse xx^{li} beside his costes vj^{li}. at Vale royall xv^{li} beside his costes vj^{li} and his rewarde vnknownen to me. And at Tarrent for the election there xx^{li} beside his costes iij^{li}. And because I knewe there by one ffisher that was sollicito^r in that matier that yo^r pleasure was he shulde haue no lesse for Tarrent I thought he toke the other but according to yo^r pleasure. And surely he asketh no lesse for euery election than xx^{li} as of dutie. which in myne opinion is to moche and aboue any dutie that euer was taken by any directo^r heretofor.

Also in his visitacions he refuseth many tymes his rewarde though it be competent, for that they offer hym so litle. and maketh theym to sende after hym such rewardes as maye pleas hym. for surely, religious men were never so affrayed of Docto^r Allenn as they be of hym he useth suche rowgh fasshion with theym.

Also he hath xij men wayting on hym in a lyverey beside his owne brother which muste be rewarded specially beside his other seruantes and that I thinke to grete a trayne to come to small houses withall.

How moche he toke at euery house I am not prevey but of fewe. And as for any licenses that he gaue since he came foorth Laste, he gaue none but to thabbot of wobo^rne. vntill he might come to you and obteigne of you a license to goo abrode.

And in some thinges I suppose that he foloweth not yo^r instructions As where I toke it that ye wolde haue all those both men & women that were xxij yere olde & between that & xxiiij they shulde choyse whether they woll tarrye or goo abrode. And he settes but religiouse men onlye at that libertie.

Also he setteth a clause in his Iniunctions, that all they that woll of what age so euer they be maye goo abrode. which I harde not of yo^r instructions.

Of his doing hereafter and of all other thinges that I shall reken worthie thaduertisement I shall adcertayne your m^rship of as I shall see cause. nowe that ye commaunde me so to doo. And as for myne owne dealing and behavio^r I truste ye shall here no iuste cause of coomplainte ageinst me, one thing humblie desiring yo^r m^rship that ye geve no Light credence till the matier be proued and my defense harde. And if it had not ben for troubling of you I wolde haue so declared vnto you the circumstance of my firste accusacion and thoccasion therof that ye shulde haue ben well persuaded that all the same proceded of a greate and a long conceyued malice ageinst me & of no matier of treuthe or worthie correction. And being so sodenlie taken and you so long before incensed by the meanes of myne aduersaries, I was so abasshed that I had not those thinges in my remembrance that was for my defense. And praye you moste humblie to persuaide yo^rself that I hauyng so many & so greate benefites at yo^r hande, and hanging onlye vpon your good successe cannot, but yf I were the moste vnnaturall person in the worlde, do or suffer to be doon to my power any thing that might be impeachment of yo^r hono^r or worship. which I praye god euenso to preserue as I wolde myne owne liffe. And thus allmightie god haue yo^r m^rship in his blessed keping. ffrom Warden Abbeye this xvjth of October

THE EXAMYNACION OF RICHARD HALFORD MONKE OF THABBEY OF BREWTON TAKEN IN THE FFLETE BEFORE THOS. BEDILL ONE OF THE KYNGES MOST HONORABLE CONSELL.

The said Richard of thage of xli yeres examyned the xij daie of June the xxviij yere of the reigne of o^r souereygn lord Kyng Henry the viijth of & vpon dyuerse interrogateries thyn mynystred answereth deposeth as hereafter ensyeth. To the ffirst & second he affirmeth to be true.

To the thirde he saith that the lycence was rased and in the place of the worde priorat was written this worde monasterii² by the clerk or clerkes which wrote the said licence as far as this respondent knoweth And saith that M^r vnderhill whiche procured the said licence shewed this respondent that the said wordes were written and amend by the seid clerkes

² Bruton was made an Abbey in the beginning of the Reign of Hen. VIII. See Tanner, Not. Mon. Co. Somt. Art. Bruton.

To all the residue of the interrogatories he saith that after the said lycence was opteyned as well vnder the kyng o^r soueregne Lord his brode seale as also vnder my lorde Archebusshop of Canterburyes seale by the procurement of the said M^r vnderhill one Roberd Wattes serunt vnto the said M^r underhill vpon seynt Georges daie last past in the before none of the same daie came vnto this depo^t then beyng in thesaid monastery And ther delyuered to this respondent both the seid licence vnder my lorde of Canterburyes seale and confirmacion under the brode seale of England And when (?) this respondent had perused and red them ouer And founde the ffawt of the vurde priorat this respondent shewed the said messenger that the same lycence was not god by cause of the worde prioratus saying that it shuld haue been monasterii And wrote a letter ynnmediately vnto the seid Th. underhill aduertesyng hym accordyngly requyryng hym by the same to cause the same licence to be made good and effectuell. And requyred hym not to cause it to be reased And that done deluered the same lettere and the seid licence & confirmacion to the seid messenger to be delyuered by hym to his seid master, And saith that about iij wekes past the said Wattes brought agen this respondent the seid licence & confirmacion euery of them beyng rasid & amended as it nowe appereth, which messenger brought not onylie from his seid m^r but said to this dep^t by worde that they were sufficient and good y nough for all ther rasyng saying that they were amended by them that ffyrst wrote the same, and also he saith that about v or vj or vij daies after the recept thereof this respondent shewed the same to the abbot of the seid monastery vchich upon the sight therof ffound the seid ffawt in the said rasyng.

And saith that the seid M^r Vnderhill opteyned the seid licence And confirmacion wythout takyn any reward or promys of reward for his paynes & dylygence in thoptynyng of the same or the amending of the same.

Except that this respondent payed the ordynary charges the which came to iiij^{li} vj^s viij^d.

THE EXAMYNACION OF THE SEID RICHARD HOLFORD
TAKEN BEFORE THE SEID THOMAS BEDELL
THE DAIE & YERE & PLACE AFORESEID.

To the ffirst he saith that he knoweth no maner of cryme agenst thabbott of the seid monastery that he is able to prove

To all the residewe of the seid interrogatories he saith that he neuer conspired wyth the seid harold Hert or Whight ne ony of theym ne wyth ony other person or persons to accuse the said abbot of any Treason nor neuer conspired the death of the said abbot ne any other displesre towards hym. And saith also that he knoweth not for trueth that the said Harold Hert and White conspired together to accuse the said abbot of Treason or otherwyse conspired his death but saith that about ij yeres past or more S^r Willm Sturton knyght nowe beyng lorde Sturton came vnto the seid monastery (the abbot then not beyng ther at home) Att whiche tyme the said Harold delyuered to the seid S^r William a bille of accusacion of the seid abbot in the chamber of the seid white (this respondent then beyng nothyng previe therunto) And saith that afterward this depo^t hauyng not any knowledge of the delyuery of the said bille went vnto the seid S^r William Sturton And requyred hym of hys advyse and furtherance in the opteynyn of his seid licence And after that they had ffynysshed ther covercacion for that purpose the seid S^r William Sturton shewed this depo^t the said bille of accusacion which as he said the seid Harold delyuered vnto hym And demanded of this respondent if he knewe of any suche wordes that the Abbot had said or spoken. And this respondent answered and said that he neuer herd the said Abbot saye any such wordes nor neuer herd any other man report that euer the said abbot dyd euer speke any such wordes. And this depo^t saith that in the next mornyng after this doponentes reterne to the seid monastery this respondent shewed the seid abbot of the seid bille of accusacion which the said Mr Sturton had shewed hym And the said Abbot vtterly denyed to this respondent that euer he spake any suche wordes nor reasoned any ffurth^r in the matter at that tyme nor at any after tyme wythe this respondent. And saith that not long after, this the seid Harold and this respondent had conuercacion of the said bille of accusacion at which tyme the same Harold afirmed to this respondent that he herd the seid Abbot speke the seid wordes complyned in the seid bille ayenst the quene in the heryng also of the prior of the said monastery and two or three other chanons of the said monastery. vnto whome this respondent said that he neuer herd the said abbot speke any such wordes.

And saith that ther was neuer any other conuercacion of this matter bytwene this respondent and the said Hert but onely of this effect that the seid Hert was sorry that the said harold had made the said accusacion vpon the seid abbot.

And saith also that the said white shewed this respondent that the seid harold shewed hym that he herd the seid abbot speake onfittyng wordes ayenst the quenes grace And other conuercacion was not bytwene them in that behalf.

And saith that he neuer had not any conuercacion w^t the seid pres^r ne any other chanon of the seid monastery in that matter.

And saith that the seid abbot hath been abbot of the seid monastery about iiij yeres and this respondent hath been chanon professed in the said monastery by the space of xvij or xix yeres,

And saith that he thynketh in his consience that the seid abbot neuer spake ony such wordes ayenst the quene as ar writyned in the said bille but shurre the rather that the seid Harold and white conspired to accuse the seid abbot theref wrongfully. And saith that the seid Harold is of thage of xxiiij yeres or thrabout and hath been Chanon professed in the same house abouet vij or viij or ix yeres. And saith that the seid vhte is of thage of xl yeres and hath been serfunt in the house ther thys vij or viij yeres as this respondent remebreth.

All whiche premisses before confessed and declared by this respondent in forme and maner aforeseid as well of the seid licence as also of the seid bille of accusacion and all other the premisses this respondent affyrmeth to be true in euery behalff by his othe which hath taken the Daie & yere abouesaid vpon the Holy Euangelist.

Oure moste bounden dueties remembred, yt maye please yo^r good Lordeshippe to be aduertysed that sythens o^r laste lettres we haue w^t as goode expedicon as we myght taken surrender of the howses of Sainete Johnes in Wellis, S^t Johnes in Brydgewater, Athelney, Bucklande Monialium, Tawnton, Dunkswell Chanonlegh & polstowe, & in all thies howses haue founde as moche conformyttes as myght be desyred. Savyng that in many of theym we haue founde great waste & many leasses of late passed which neuerthelesse we haue stayed & called in agayn as nyer as we myght. And by cause we wolde as moche as in vs is, take awaye thoccasion of attemptyng the lyeke in other howses, we haue thought good having now receyved from yo^r Lordeshippe the comyssion in which m^r pollarde ys joyned w^t vs, to devyde ow^r selves, soo that ij of vs beyng at one howse thother ij may in the same tyme dispasche an other by which mean we thinke we shall not onely staye many suche wastes and spoyles as beyng passed before o^r comyng coude neuer be recovered agayne, but also (as we truste) make an ende of all

CHAPTER II.

THE SOMERSET MONKS AND NUNS.

ONE, surely, of the most noteworthy effects of the Suppression was the remingling with the world of all the religious. This must be dealt with before we proceed to questions of property and remoter results of the Dissolution.

At the outset we must guard against misconception. English monks did not lead a life of seclusion¹. At the present day, when the few communities which do exist are regarded much in the light of foreigners, it is very difficult to realize this. Difficult to realize the monk as a traveller; still more, as a jovial, good-hearted companion². But that it was so seems quite certain. Misericord or stated indulgence, allowing a mitigation of the severities of the rule, was extended so as to allow a great deal of visiting and wandering about; Wolsey found it necessary to restrain the Augustine Canons in this respect. Most houses had cells attached to them, often at a considerable distance, serving to form an excuse for a pleasant holiday. Thus we read that three of the monks of Bath were away at Dunster when a visitation was made; and a letter of Layton's talks of an Irish cell of the same house which would require visiting. It were idle to multiply instances shewing that English monks did not lead a secluded life but mingled with the people around them, often joining in their sports, and not unfrequently having quite a reputation as athletes or sometimes it is to be feared as toppers¹.

¹ Nor did nuns. See generally Fosbrooke, Som. Arch. Soc.'s Procs. vol. xii. p. 92, and Hugo, Med. Nunneries of Somerset. It is odd to find an Augustine Canon employed in a neighbouring parish to mend vestments, but it was probably work requiring a good deal of skill. For the instance see Churchwardens' Accounts, ed. Hobhouse (Som. Rec. Soc. vol. 4), p. 135. The village in point was Yatton, and the Canon probably came from Worspring.

² Thor. Rogers says that the monks were unpopular, but this cannot be true of the lower classes.

Probably these qualities of good fellowship endeared them to their poorer neighbours, and the slightness of the ripple which their disappearance caused may have been due to their being such good friends with the mammon of unrighteousness around them.

The Dissolution again did not come altogether as a bolt from the blue. Five years even in slow-moving times allows of a good deal of preparation. Foreign houses would be communicated with, friends written to, probably families would offer positions as private chaplains to such as were in orders. Finally, the Universities would be sounded by such as were learned whether there was any opening for new professors or tutors. Those, however, who would be able to do most in the way of anticipation were it is to be feared those who needed it least. This brings us a stage further.

It is a common error to suppose that all the ejected monks were pensioned, an error which Father Gasquet¹ has dispelled. The real state of the case seems to have been something like this. The heads, as a rule, of the smaller houses had pensions, their brethren having a choice of two courses: "to have their capacities² to live honestly and virtuously abroad and some convenient charity disposed to them toward their living;" or else "to be committed to such honorable great monasteries of this realm wherein good religion is observed, as shall be limited by his highness there to live religiously during their lives³." In Somerset the whole convent of Bridgewater, which had an income of only £120. 19s. 1d., had annuities allotted to them, but their case seems exceptional.

We ought to say something of the way in which the pensions were granted. The Commissioners when on their rounds had, or thought they had, power to settle the amounts of what was to be given.

³ G. quoting R. O. ch. H. bks. $\frac{2}{29}$, p. 96.

There seems no doubt that they used this power unworthily, as the large grants to the heads would seem to shew, indeed as their own letters also clearly imply. This settlement of the pensions, proportioned it may be imagined to the stubbornness of the house, was duly sent up to the Augmentation Office; occasionally Rich the Chancellor made a copy, and on this report the patents were made out. The letters from the Commissioners relating to Somerset Houses which could be found among the miscellaneous books of the Augmentation Office have been placed at the end of this chapter. The patents then, the title-deeds of the monks, were drawn up on a uniform plan, only differing in wording as was necessary; the only change in fact made being such as the sex of the recipient or some special circumstance of the case required.

Father Gasquet states that the Glastonbury monks had no annuity, but the letter printed later seems to imply the contrary. But it must be admitted that none of their patents can be found¹. Probably it was not found advisable to absolutely trust Layton and his fellow-workers.

The uniformity of the brethren's pensions is striking, and the slight variations which do occur seem, if looked at impartially, very judiciously managed. An impotent man and one that was old received more than his fellows; a Bachelor of Divinity more than a Literate. Those who did get pensions on the whole had no great reason to be dissatisfied with their amounts¹.

It is not so easy to speak favourably of the treatment of the heads of the houses. We find indeed very large sums given, far too large, gratuities as well as pensions. The Prior of Montacute, for instance, received in all, capitalizing his pension, about £20,000 in our value. There is a most unpleasant suspicion that the head was won over, if he could not be bullied into submission, by the promise of a bribe in order that he might in turn influence the members of his house. This opinion has been formed from reading letters such as appear in the first chapter, and from considering the cases of Bruton, Witham, Montacute and Bath. Witham and Bruton were of about the same yearly value, why the disparity between the annuities? Again, if Bath were worthy of dissolution on the grounds that Layton urged, the head was at least guilty of negligence. His case makes one inclined to agree with Fish's casual judgment, which is found in the "Supplycacion to our moste soueraigne Lorde kinge Henry the Eight" and may be taken for what it is worth. It runs:—

"And yet, notwithstandinge this wante and lack of knowleage in Godes Worde and the euyll which commethe manyfestly therof, (the more it is to be lamented) there be many popishe monckes, which late were abbottes, (to whom not onely vnworthely, but also vniustely, were geuen greate pensyons) and many of their covent monckes, hauinge nother lernynge nor other godly qualytyes, (apte, meate, or conveyent to be in spirituall pastours) be nowe admytted to haue cure of soules¹."

As the gratuities to the heads do not appear in the lists added to this chapter it may be well to give a few examples. The Abbot of Athelney had the prebend of Long Sutton. The Master of the hospital at Bridgewater £16. 13s. 4d. The Prior of Bruton £20. 0s. 0d. The Prior of Henton £11².

Nuns had usually about £3 a year given them (taking the whole of England); not a large amount, but sufficient in those days to support a single woman comfortably enough. The nuns were as a rule of good social position, so that they wanted help less than the monks. It is the more surprising, if we remember that the heads and members must have been of an equally respectable position, to note the same disparity in the amounts of the respective pensions. Catherine Bowser had fifty pounds a year³, her sisters but four, at Buckland. At Cannington Cecilia Verney had ten marcs⁴, her sisters nothing. Katerine Bulle got £5, but we find no mention of the rest of the convent, even in Pole's list⁵.

³ Besides a gratuity of £25 (see Hugo, Med. Nuns, Buckland, 126).

⁴ She probably never, according to Hugo (Med. Nuns, Cannington, 78), had them paid to her.

⁵ Hugo, Med. Nuns, Mynchin Barrow Priory, 52.

As there were but just over thirty professed nuns in Somerset it can readily be understood how soon and how easily they passed out of public notice.

The number of religious ejected in the county, most of whom received pensions, is very difficult to decide. Those who were living at the beginning of queen Mary's reign, when the enquiry was held which resulted in the work known as Cardinal Pole's Pension Book, will be found at the end of this chapter. But many who never received or bartered away the pensions it would be difficult to trace.

It may be assumed that Dr Gasquet is correct in saying that friars had no pension but were turned out with a few shillings. There were, however, few friars in Somerset. The Secular Priests at Bridgewater had pensions assigned to them in the ordinary way¹.

The Chantry priests may be mentioned here, although their turn did not come till the reign of Edward the Sixth. When they were cast into the world they had very fair treatment. In Somerset all had a pension, the average being £4. 5s. 10d.² a year, which, although below the average of what they received as priests, was a decent allowance; and as their continuance, after the fall of the religious houses, was decided to be unprofitable, there is little fault to be found with the Commissioners who adjusted their incomes. In number perhaps there were a hundred at the suppression time, 78 of whom appear in the Pension Book a few years later. A glance at the 'Survey' of the chantries edited by Mr Green will shew how intricate the chantry system was, and how vast the every-day consequences of its abolition must have been¹. The chantry priests then quietly joined their fellow-sufferers with, as was noticed in the first chapter, an excellent character given them by their neighbours. In this way, adding the fact that a few years had slipped away, we may explain if we will the decent maintenance that was allowed them.

The pensions in some cases were paid to the monks and nuns directly by the Augmentation officers in London, but more usually by the Royal receivers down in Somerset. Examples from the miscellaneous books of the Augmentation Office and from the ministers' accounts have been added to illustrate both methods.

What became of the ejected pensioners? How did they live? In what connections do their names subsequently recur? A more important question: Were their pensions regularly paid? Such questions have been often asked but to them no satisfactory answer has been returned, nor perhaps ever will be. The investigation has been pronounced difficult by authorities like Father Gasquet, who have struggled through the various Rolls of the Courts and left no stone unturned in the hope of finding a trace of the after-life of the English religious.

In speculating on their fate we must not forget that, whatever may be said to the contrary by enthusiastic mediævalists, the monks were really in the time of Henry the Eighth bodies of country gentlemen; good-hearted country gentlemen to be sure, but in no way much different from the world around them. It was just this, to quote a remark of Canon Creighton's¹, that made their ruin so easy. Henry turned on them suddenly and required them to prove that they were saints. The fact that they disappeared so quietly seems to shew that they were much as other men, and, again quoting Canon Creighton, is evidence, and strong evidence, that the Dissolution ought to be regarded as the result or one of the signs of the great social revolution of the sixteenth century rather than, as it has too often been viewed, its great antecedent cause. That the monks were good-hearted country gentlemen anyone who has not started with a theory to support may gather from their correspondence and their whole system of life². Such letters as those respecting the rules of confinement imposed by the victors all have a temporal rather than a spiritual motive. What are all the charters of abbeys concerned with but the ordinary affairs of the life of a landowner? It will be answered that these are the points of contact with the outside world, and that hence they come specially before us, while the religious life of the cloister was continued in a steady routine of faithfulness. Admit it, and the criticism still remains that these temporal interests were too vast and their regulation by an easy-going corporation a serious cause of national loss. Times, again it may be, has been, urged, had altered since the days when poverty absolute or moderate had been helpful or necessary. But he who urges such a plea is on very dangerous ground. To him it will be said that in modelling their life with a regard to the well-being of the country the religious houses accepted the position that when by general consent that system became burdensome it would be dispensed with or at all events altered. And no one who does not belong to the class of professed apologists will contend that a change so memorable, so vital, productive of so much temporary misery, and conducted with such heartless brutality could have been successfully carried out in this country if the great mass of middle class people had not been certain that a change was necessary. Spain, Italy, Germany, France, England, have all had their suppressions, and the very horror of it in the last two countries seems irresistibly to prove how necessary it was. In saying this, we are very far from saying that the agents concerned directly were national benefactors. They were in fact much as this country has always employed in similar crises, a set of time-serving hypocrites. The point is that they were necessary.

It was very difficult to travel in Henry the Eighth's reign, especially for poor men. One may know that from the grants for travelling expenses preserved in Mr Gairdner's "Letters and Papers." So that the monks could not go far in many instances. The independence of the English Church¹, not less than the apathetic selfishness, to call it by a hard name, of foreign houses, must have prevented any very great migration abroad. It was a far cry from Somerset to Oxford¹, though there is a report based on Wood's account that a good many ejected monks went there. We have however a few definite records which may now be entered upon.

The first case we note is that of Thomas Dale, a monk of Taunton Priory, who as will be seen had the living of St James given to him with £8 for his yearly 'wages,' some two pounds ten shillings more than his brethren. In the same way John Wallis, prior of a cell of Montacute at Holme, had to remain there and serve the cure with a stipend a little larger than the pension, which was however to be reduced if he happened to be impotent or lame². Again, in the patent granting a pension to John Fowler, a brother from Keynsham Abbey, we find the following:

"Prouiso semper quod si predictus Johannes ffowler missam singulis diebus dominicis et diebus festinalibus in ecclesia sancte margarete in charleton in dicto comitatu nostro somerset celebrare recusauit quod tunc et deinceps idem Johannes habebit gaudebit nisi quinque libras sex solidos et octo denarios annuatim de dicta pencione sex librarum tresdecim cell of Bec: but that was a merely financial relation, latterly not even that, and Bruton and Coutances had some sort of connection; see Som. Arch. Soc. Proc. xix. 95.

¹ It is interesting to read the account of a many days' journey into Bucks from Somerset to resettle paupers very long after Henry VIII.'s time.

*solidorum et quattuor denariorum aliquo in presentibus in contrarium inde non obstatu*¹."

Thus far we are on firm ground; the following must not be accepted as more than mere possibilities. Where we find a monk of a certain name, and on searching discover that someone of the same name was instituted rector or vicar of some parish in the county a year or two later, the similarity is not a very strong argument in favour of identity.

Thomas Powell then was a monk of Bath, and a man of the same name was presented to the rectory of Tellisford in 1554². It appears that one Richard Webb de Bekington was part-owner of the advowson, and the idea suggests itself that he may have been a connection of John Bekington, a brother monk of Powell's, and that hence would come the presentation. The identity is much surer in the case of William Clementt. He was also of Bath, and almost certainly the same as the William Clement who served St Mary's, Bath, from 1541³, notwithstanding a slight difference in spelling, which no one will weigh too heavily who remembers that in the first chapter Hord, the prior of Hinton, spells his own name differently from his brother's. One would have expected that Robert Walshe, the prior of Bridgewater, would have been allowed to continue to hold the rectory of St Andrew's, Northover, which he had obtained as early as 1506⁴, but it does not appear to have escaped the spoiler. Perhaps Robert Fysher, returned as deacon at Bridgewater, was the Robert Fisher who in 1554 was made rector of St Michael's, Puriton¹. Four years later John Mors, who had been a novice at the same house as Fisher in the Supremacy times, was appointed to Compton Pauncefoot, which rectory he held till 1589². Then again John Dunster, S. T. B. who was rector of All Saints, Kingsdon, in 1556³, may have been fifteen years or more before that an inmate of Bruton, but the addition of the degree makes against his having been such. The precise spelling of names as before remarked is not of much account, a fact which may excuse the following suggestions; no one will consider them in any other light. We find from Hugo's list⁴ that a certain Thomas Genyngs obtained the living of Norton Fitzwarren sometime after 1542, that he was deprived for reasons unknown, and again that he was restored after 1554. There is no impossibility in his being the same former Benedictine of Athelney who subscribed to the supremacy as Thomas Genynges. In the same way, only with less probability, the John Pauly of Glastonbury, as his name is written on the Supremacy acknowledgement, may be proved to have afterwards in 1558 appeared on the list of rectors of Hinton St George as Jo. Pawlet⁵; the two spellings are common enough at the time at all events. Keinton Mandeville had a rector John Crybbe⁶, and Montacute had a Cluniac John Crybe. One is much more certain when we come to Wells, for it seems probable that the Ric. Clarkson who held the vicarage of St Cuthberts Wells from 1530¹ until his death was none other than the Clerkson who was master of the Hospital of St John Baptist there. The pensions are in some cases a guide; John Symmes, the Vicar of Ashcott from 1558 till 1586, must have died at a great age if he be the same as Symmys of Montacute, but the latter was not apparently an S. T. B., judging from his pension when he was discharged, which a vicar of Yeovil² of the same name in 1547 was; and hence the latter identity is less probable even than the former. The same may be said as to John Dove marked, when at Witham as in orders, who had not the degree to identify him with the rector of Farnborow in 1554³. We may reasonably decline to enter upon the question of the John Smiths⁴. It will be remembered perhaps that when the Commissioners for taking the surrenders arrived at Hinton, they were much concerned about one Nicholas Ballard, whose temerity in denying the king's supremacy could only be excused on the supposition of his insanity. He appears⁵ to have been kept in confinement for a time by Sir W. Hungerford, but as he is found on the pension list his insanity must have gained the day. It is not a very common name, and no doubt he was the Nicholas Ballard who for a very short time after 1557⁶ held the vicarage of Lockyng.

Several monks became for a short time chantry priests. In two cases the fact of their having been members of a convent is expressly mentioned in the Survey, John Benet for example at Langport¹, and John Spicer at Wellington², the one from Glastonbury, the other from Bruton. From the same authorities we surmise that John Pytte serving a chantry in St James's, Taunton³, may have been the former sub-prior of Bath. He is described as "clerke of the age of lxiiij yeres, a man of honest conversation." Of the few absentee chantry priests, one, who ought to have been at South Petherton, is noted in the Survey⁴ as William Dyer, Clerke. He may have come from Montacute. But there seems every reason against supposing that John Mychel, the large-incomed prior of Witham Charterhouse, needed the £4. 5s. 10*d*. which was paid at Crewkerne to a chantry priest of the same name⁵. The latter was in 1548 eighty years of age.

It is unfortunate that more cannot be known of the Assizes in Henry the Eighth's last years. If there were any records the names of some of the pensioners would be sure to appear. As it is the Rolls of the London Courts are all that can be relied on in a general way, and for this work they have not of course been attempted. It is understood however that such efforts as have been made in the hope of tracing the religious have not met with success proportioned to the trouble involved, not such at all events as to encourage anyone who is writing a mere sketch to attempt anything of the kind. Incidentally a few more particulars may be noted. The monk at Bruton was examined at London, as we have seen, and if Fish has the slightest foundation for his assertion a number of those in orders no doubt felt the weight of Henry's arm. The passage referred to runs thus:

'The remenaunt of the sturdy beggers (not yet weaded out) do daylye in theyr writynges, counsels and preachynges stere us thereunto¹. For what meane they in their sermons when they lament the great discord and miserable estate of this our tyme, wishinge that all thyng were nowe as it was xx yeares since: but that they woulde have a Pope pardons, lightyng of candels to Images, knockyng and knelyng to them with running hither and thither on pilgrimage²."

At Mary's accession a few Somerset Carthusians from Witham and Hinton reassembled at Sheen under Chauncey, four Benedictines from Glastonbury gathered round Feckenham at Westminster³. Perhaps a few became schoolmasters, though they had fewer opportunities of following that profession than might have been supposed, for the best of reasons, namely, that there were very few schools. Some were of good family, and therefore were preserved from want. The chantry priests were well off in the amount of their pensions¹; judging from their names too they would occasionally find influential friends; the report of their characters is so good that they can have made but few enemies. This destruction of the chantries must have, taken with the disappearance of the monasteries, accentuated the difficulty of dealing with younger sons, a difficulty which would press very heavily now that the practice of farming an estate by a landlord and his family had died out².

From the ministers' accounts and the Augmentation Office Books³, it can be gathered that the pensioners very soon decreased in number. A great many died shortly after the pensions were granted, some could not get to the Receiver owing to age or distance; many, immediate and pressing want compelled to sell their patents for ready money, generally small in amount. The abuses in the payment were such that the Act 2 and 3 Edw. VI. was found to be necessary and a commission was appointed⁴. Finally, we have Cardinal Pole's celebrated list which was made in 1553.

NOTES ON SOME OF THE MISCELLANEOUS BOOKS OF THE AUGMENTATION OFFICE.

Volume 232 of this series is composed of Patents granting pensions to the members of various dissolved Houses. It contains, however, only the following which are concerned with Somerset Religious: folio 29 one patent for Cleeve: fo. 35 one patent granting the prior of Worspring a pension of £12 a year: fo. 36 a similar grant of 20 marks to the prior of Barlinch: fo. 39 a similar patent giving 10 marks to the prioress of Cannington: fo. 48 another to the Prioress of Mynchinbarrow of 100/- yearly. The date of all these is 28 Henry VIII. The latter part of the volume, however, contains the patents of the year following.

Volume 233² is also composed of patents, but contains more of those granted to Somerset people than the former. They all, like the others in this volume, belong to the year 30—31 Hen. VIII., and

In volume 250 (38 Hen. VIII.) the accounts cease as regards Somerset. There is a mention of Wm. Sudbrie of Bath with the sum of v^{li} vj^s viij^d which he ought to have received, but did not receive. His name was more probably Godbury al. Edger. In this volume there are very numerous payments (59) in respect of Sion. But it fully bears out the inference that the pensions, where paid at all, were mostly paid by the receivers down in the country.

In volume 251 (2 Edw. VI.) there are one or two Somerset pensions, and so in later volumes, but when we get even so far as vol. 252 the total number of pensions paid at the augmentation office is very small.

The following is an extract from the ministers' accounts. It is rare to find, at least in the case of Somerset, any but the head of the house mentioned, which taken with the fact that very few payments were made in London, confirms the opinion often expressed that the pensions were in many instances either not claimed or not paid. Probably a good many accounts are missing. The rolls which do remain are in splendid preservation and very carefully drawn up. They represent from year to year the accounts of the newly acquired monastic property of every kind. As grants are made by the king of this or that manor or rectory the roll of each monastery becomes less and less, and hence the whole history of the confiscated estates is to be found in these rolls taken together with the particulars for grants of each year.

In Min. Accts. 28, 29 Hen. VIII. No. 186, there is a similar series of pensions to that which follows.

CHAPTER III.

THE PROPERTY OF THE HOUSES.

THE best way of finding out the means of living which the monks had, the property of the convents, is that of studying some scheme of accounts such as the Valor. If this be looked into, and the information supplemented by comparing later surveys of any given house, it will be seen how very complex the whole system of revenue was, and what an error it is to suppose that, holding all their land in Frank-almoign, the monks neither paid rent nor rendered service for it to the various lay or spiritual mesne lords. A religious house derived its income in many different ways. There were rents from free and customary tenants in the manors; rents from leaseholders who had taken either land or tithe at a fixed rent; and the land let out at lease might be part of the demesne lands or might be part of that which the convent held as freehold, having acquired it by purchase. Sometimes a whole manor was let out at lease. Then we must add profits from impropriated rectories, and pensions charged upon livings. At Bath and Glastonbury, to give instances of the last source of income, the sacrist, the cellarer, and even the cook, were paid by pensions; it was in fact a kind of partial impropriation.

This then was ready for the grantee. But it was by no means all. As will be seen later the demesne lands were largely out of the personal control of the monks at the time of the Dissolution, but they were not all so; and where they were still farmed by the convents there was stock of various kinds. The monastic site, the granges and cells, the buildings with all their contents, lead from roofs, bells, libraries, vestments, plate and general furniture, have all to be added also¹.

The policy of the Government, the same in Somerset as elsewhere with regard to the monastic property, has been explained by a multitude of writers and is supposed to have been due to Cromwell's advice. The aim of course was to buy the adherence of the prominent families by allowing them to become owners on very easy terms. The great landowners in each county were thus made accomplices in the confiscation. How successfully this was managed the reign of Mary sufficiently witnessed. The ease with which so tremendous a change was effected must in great part be attributed to the careful conduct of the grantees; there was little resistance and everything became rapidly accommodated to the new state of things. "Nothing more is said about the abbeys," reported the Venetian Ambassador very shortly after the Suppression².

Often very advantageous exchanges³ were allowed, or a low-priced sale, or a lease at a rent of small amount. It is said too that the valuations were not bona fide¹. The small pensions were, unless extinguished in the grant, kept on foot. England has until recent years been a soil fruitful in rent-charges, every manner of small outcome has been skilfully applied to estates until at the close of the last century the network of annuities by way of mortgage or settlement that overspread the country made it very difficult to know where to look for the beneficiary. A forty shilling charge gave a vote. That all this was so may be accounted for partly by the habit coming from the manorial system of small charges with its quit-rents and customary payments; partly no doubt it arose from the ingenuity of the lawyers in providing relief for the extravagant without the degradation of a public transfer. In early times the scarcity of money, rendering an out-and-out fully discharged sale of landed property unusual and almost impossible, may have had something to do with it. The Dissolution must have done a great deal towards fixing and deepening the custom of charging lands among laymen and accustoming the holders of the charges to their transfer from one to another. The vast system of monastic charges passed into private hands, hands that were quite prepared to manipulate accounts that were in any way worth manipulating. Often too, as may be seen from the particulars preserved, in the grant of the land an estate went to one and a fee-farm rent was reserved to the crown, perhaps to be granted out again to some third party.

As regards real estate, immediately the Dissolution was accomplished every effort was made to secure a share in the property which was at the king's disposal. If not sold at once a lease was made of all or part of the demesnes, and that these leases were advantageous may be gathered from the eagerness with which they were sought after. He who desired such drew up 'particulars' of what property he wished to farm, and this document if approved had the authority of the Court of Augmentation given to it by a written direction that a lease should be made out. An example of such a transaction is given in the appendix to this chapter. The same course was pursued by those who wished to purchase¹. Particulars with a request added were sent up to London and a proper direction given as to the grant to be made out. The rate of purchase was endorsed on the deed. When all was completed the grant was enrolled on the Patent Roll. Many more requests to purchase with their accompanying particulars were preferred than could be granted. There were many candidates for the same farm or site. A man too might have the promise of a good offer and then later find himself supplanted by one who had the ear of the court. As regards the sites the following is a list of the grantees:

Keynsham, Thomas Bridges.

The conclusions to be drawn from the names are fairly obvious. Probably owing to the great noblemen who were interested in the district, and also owing to the fame which Glastonbury must have had, most of the Somerset houses were well known, and a great part of their property passed into the hands of what would be described as country gentlemen; more at all events than in most counties. At the same time comparing the above list with the list preserved of those who were men of some property in Henry VII.th's time in the county, or who had served the county in the capacity of sheriff or member, it will be found that apart from the noblemen there are but to be found the names of Rogers and Berkeley. On the other hand after these grants there appear in similar lists the Hoptons, Colles, and others, shewing, not that the latter at the Dissolution were below the class of gentlemen then so carefully hedged in, but that they were not among the circle among which the offices of the county were distributed. It is very common to talk of the 'new men' of the Tudor period, but to do so can only be approximately correct. Almost all the stock examples had been 'armigeri,' gentlemen, two hundred years before they rose to great prominence, and as such were more than probably representatives of younger branches of ancient families¹. This may be said of the Cavendishes and Russells, and in Somersetshire of men like the Strangways, Sydenhams, and Pophams. The sneer too with which the representatives of the De Veres, Howards, de Courcys are usually supposed to have greeted the new men was more than probably non-existent. No corresponding feeling can be traced on the Continent, at all events, about this period, where formal and luxurious, if dying, feudalism tended rather towards an equality among armigeri. Of this the arrangement of the Court of Henry IV. may be given as an example. The really new feature of the aristocracy was that it represented the changed state of the nation at large. It was in fact an 'aristocracy of office,' and everything favoured its formation.

But the sites and demesne lands, though most closely connected in our minds with the monastic system, by no means complete the matter. From an index of the grants termed 'decrees issuing out of the Court of Augmentations' year by year during the latter part of the reign of Henry the Eighth, it may be learned how minute was the distribution of Abbey wealth. Many small pensions charged on the various conventual properties are granted to one and another. Just before dissolution too all the offices in the monasteries which had a money value appear to have been usurped by powerful and avaricious laymen. Thus Andrew Luttrell and his son John, both of Dunster, become land stewards to the Convent of Cleve. The same unhappy house had to appoint John Wyndham and his son stewards of their courts leet; a similar course was taken at Bath, Taunton and Keynsham. And not merely were annuities and offices so granted, but leases made upon easy terms by the Houses in their terror, rectories given, and rights of wood-cutting and the like. Of all these there are many examples. Taunton gives the next presentation to Ninehead to three grantees. Worspring grants a farm to Sir John Seyntlow; Bridgewater 300 acres of wood to the Earl of Bath. The custom of giving offices to laymen was not a new one but was much extended by the circumstances of the time.

The forced sales and grants must have affected the price of land, but it will be noted later that together with other economic causes which kept the price steadier than might be supposed was the fact that the largest owners were not land merchants but men with families to keep up or those who hoped to found a wealthy house. If men who have a thousand acres each receive severally ten thousand acres more, and to all appearance intend to quietly hold them, the old tenants not being displaced, it is not to be expected that the price of land will either rise or fall very greatly excepting as between grantees and the grantor, who in this instance was the king. The case of course was entirely different after the French Revolution in France; the important point is that in England buyers who took monastic land were not generally or even often speculators but men who intended to hold the property as an ancestral estate.

What amount of land the monasteries held the following attempts at calculation will shew how difficult it is to say. Leaving for a moment the chantries, the surveys we possess note the rentals but not the acreage; and then again as has been indicated the religious houses tapped the profits of the soil in every possible way, so that all attempts at deducing the acreage from the income must be, at least, considerably wide of the mark. What do we mean by owning land? At the present day the lord of a manor would certainly not be reckoned as the owner of the freeholds because the quit-rents are of such trifling value; again the copyholds are in almost the same condition, the customary rents having been fixed from the time of Edward IV. But it was different in Henry VIII.'s time, and yet even then the rents of the free tenants and of the copyholders would not represent anything approaching to a rack rent. It is said too that the demesnes were not let on hard terms, and then again we have the system of fines on leasing which interferes so greatly with accurate calculation. It has been estimated that a fifth of the land in England in 1530 was in religious hands. Somerset had more than its share of convents, so that we ought to take a fourth for that county. The rental was somewhere about £7000 per annum without the chantries. Now calculating from Mr Green's volume the average rent of an acre of land seems about 1s. 6d., but that is probably too high for large conventual estates, most of the chantry fields, with which the 'survey' was concerned, being what we should term accommodation land, so that a shilling a year perhaps would not be far wrong. This would give us 140,000 acres.

Now as to the chantries. From the same source, Mr Green's edition of the survey and rental, we learn all about their property. A few illustrations are appended to this chapter. The chantry priests though not rich men were comfortably provided for; their five pounds per annum coming from rent-charges on neighbouring properties, or directly from small rented closes of land. The whole income in the county amounted to over nine hundred pounds, to which we must apply the one and sixpenny scale, giving as a result 12,000 acres.

We have about 150,000 acres then out of an unknown total (about 900,000 are under cultivation at the present day¹, probably not more than 700,000 were then).

But the above is after all valueless excepting as shewing how dangerous such calculations are, for this reason if for no other. No account is taken of house property. If such had been reckoned the acreage would be largely reduced. The convents held many messuages, as can be seen from the accounts, and the chantries were in the same position. If this and the unreal nature of manorial ownership are remembered, although the two qualifications may seem to counteract each other as elements of error, no real reliance will be placed upon figures as to the acreage¹.

The fate of the chantry lands was perhaps more varied than that of the convents. Although all were nominally vested in the crown private persons secured possession of a good deal of property, bringing up ancient claims, or again boldly usurping²; this before as well as at the time of the Suppression. Land in the king's hands was managed by receivers and slowly distributed among private grantees either by purchase or gift. In some very few cases, as we shall see later, the promises as to education were carried out, but in the main the lands, which in very many instances as appears in another chapter were by their original grantors directly charged with periodic donations to the poor, were diverted from their proper uses and passed into private hands³.

The cattle belonging to the convents were sold in the neighbourhood. Their number must have been considerable; for one reason because the stock and land lease still continued to be employed by the convents¹; for another because a large number of obytes and the like were supported by herds devised to trustees for that object, as may be seen from Mr Green's work.

² E.g. Francis at Combe Flory (the Francis who was killed fighting against the Devonshire rebels): Popham and Halley at Selworthy: Bluett and Taylor at West Buckland: the Keneryges at Hunspyll &c.; all in Green (Survey and Rental).

We have now to enquire what became of the bells, plate, vestments, and books, and to glance at the fate of the many noble buildings which the piety or superstition of eight hundred years had reared. The actual monastery, the dwelling-house of the monks, was sometimes turned into a mansion, as at Bruton, Mynchin Barrow, and Glastonbury. But there was not much residence in the Somerset houses, or at least not for long. A party of Commissioners and their followers went through the county melting the lead and selling materials from the buildings where anything was to be made of them. The fact that the lead was hacked from the fine roofs explains how it was that Athelney, Montacute, Witham, Hinton, and Bruton have so little to remind one of the monks. Once get the roof off a building and it soon perishes, whereas, if the splendidly built monastic barns are any evidence, there have been no more lasting fabrics in England than those which the orders built, when any care has been taken of them; in other words when the new owners have thought they could be of any use. Bells² were certainly not

² Nothing is more characteristic of the 16th century than the passionate love for bell-ringing among the poor. Froude touches useless, but they fetched a little money, so we find these gentlemen from London disposing of them at the various houses, as is shewn by the accounts printed in the Appendix to this chapter.

Many of the chantry houses had been let before the Dissolution¹; so even the chantry chapels². As the house was often a pleasant one the vicar of the parish was glad to rent it. Where no more on this in his history (Vol. i. p. 62). Hentzner writing in 1598 says of the English that they are "vastly fond of great noises" that fill the ear, such as the firing of cannon, drums, and the "ringing of bells, so that it is common for a number of them" that have got a glass in their heads to go up into some belfry, "and ring the bells for hours together for the sake of exercise." New Shakesp. Soc. Pub., Series vi. p. lxvi.

The authorities did not think so much ringing good for the Somerset man, as tending to superstition. A curious letter, taken by Mr Green from the Wells mss., shews this. It is addressed to the chapter and all churchwardens, and requests them "to abstain from such unmeasurable ringing for ded persons at theire buriall and at the feast of All Soules. And that from hencefurthe they use to ringe oon bell at such tyme as sicke persones lyeth in extreme daunger of death that they which be haile may be put in remembraunce of theire owne mortalitie and also excited to praie unto God for soche their sicke neighbours, that they may pacientlie suffer death if God send it and the hard panges thereof for Christes love, who suffered much more for them, and that they may so departe out of this life in true faithe, hope, and charitie, as their soules may be afterward received into eternall felicitie to raigne with Christ everlastinglie in the kingdom of Heaven. And when the corps of any such dead person shall be brought to the church to be buried then to ring also moderatlie in the time of the obsequies thereof and no longer."

service was performed¹ the chantry priest sometimes lived on, paying a fixed sum per year. Thoroughly characteristic examples of a chantry house may be seen at Trent or at Stoke².

The above seems to require a slight explanatory digression. Perhaps a few words will clear the matter of chantries, which is certainly not too commonly understood. It may from the above have been implied that where a chantry was founded there was always a chantry chapel, a place where the chantry priest could sing or chant masses for the soul of the founder. This was often so, but the building was not generally separate from the church. Much the most usual fashion was for a small chapel to be added at one side of the chancel, a fine tomb of the founder³ being usually placed there, and a small altar for the priest's use. Unfortunately we have lost all the decorations of these chapels, which were decided to be superstitious after the Dissolution; in many cases too we have lost the chapels themselves. With regard to those chantries which stood alone many fell into decay⁴, but some were retained

¹ The condition of many of the chantries will be more particularly alluded to in the chapter on religion.

² Trent. This is perhaps as good an example as can be found. The chantry priest's house, in capital preservation, stands a little north-east of the parish church, it is two stories in height and for a single man amply large enough. Curiously the priest had obtained permission to alter the church for his own convenience, in consequence of which the transept runs parallel with the nave instead of from south to north as is usual.

³ A valuation of the iron railings round one of these tombs appears in Green, p. 100.

by the Commissioners to form churches for districts where the church accommodation was insufficient, and as such have lasted down to our own day¹.

Speaking still of the chantries, all the lead, amounting to over three thousand pounds weight, was sold to one Hyde for £128. 10s.², that is to say all the lead it was decided to remove. This of course settled the fate of the buildings. Little care was in fact taken of any removable property except plate, which all went up to London³ and was much of it simply melted down. It goes without saying that the artistic loss to the county was enormous. There were no bell-founders and metal workers like the monks had been, from St Dunstan downwards. The Englishman who visits Cordova or Seville cannot fail to be struck with the iron and bronze work in the cathedrals, and he will notice how the ecclesiastical ideas are reflected in the private gates and railings of the principal houses. If he reflects on the poor screen-work that his own country has until quite recently manufactured, poor that is to say if compared with what he will see in the chapels of Seville, it will perhaps occur to him that some loss of inspiration has come upon what surely ought to be the best of English decorated workmanship.

² Green, Introduction, xvii.

³ How valuable it was may be seen in Monastic Treasures, published by the Abbotsford Club. Pollarde, Tregonwell, Petre, and Smithe were the Somerset Commissioners who gave it in.

And not merely is this decadence to be traced in iron and bronze but in stone and wood, in gold and silver. Those who understand such matters will point to the last century as a time of imitation in the designing of silver plate. And if a chalice of the pre-Reformation period¹ be compared with the Elizabethan example, it will be seen how much had been lost by some sort of vulgarizing which the workmanship had undergone. Some of the older Communion vessels were fortunately preserved as drinking vessels, just as vestments were made into cushion-covers, and altar-cloths into the hangings of noblemen's houses. Many of the vestments came to this fate through the visitors, whose perquisites they were considered², unless they were jewelled or otherwise too valuable.

The chantry plate was very carefully catalogued in the survey. Thirty-eight chantries are returned as having no Communion vessels at all³; occasionally because two or three neighbouring chapels used the same chalice. In other cases it was because the plate belonged to the patron. One hundred and eighteen had the necessary church valuables, and the highest weight registered for a chalice was at Croscombe 26 ozs., as compared with 5 oz. the lightest at North Curry. Allowing an average for the missing returns the weight of all this chantry plate which went up to London was about 1640 ozs. for the county. To the value of this must be added £50 received for ornaments and £128. 10s.¹ for the lead, both sums greatly below the real value in all probability.

² Gasq. II. 418. From the inventory of a friary printed at the end of this chapter it may be seen how valuable vestments were considered by the country people.

³ Again, it appears from a commission printed in Archæologia, Vol. XVIII. p. 299, that a good deal of plate &c. belonging to the chantries &c. had been concealed.

Books, many of them, went up to London², some as presents to Cromwell, others because of their value. Multitudes were destroyed, Leland's awe on entering Glastonbury library not being at all a common sentiment of the time. Many as Bale notes were sent abroad, "At tymes whole shippes full, to the wonderinge of the foren nacyons³."

If one wonders how all the proceeds of the spoils were spent it must be answered in the words of Johnson, "Sir, you may wonder." A very small sum went for educational purposes, as will be seen later. £1200 of Somersetshire money strengthened Portland⁴. More perhaps was intended, but as father Gasquet has shewn⁵ the spending of the money was managed in a very different manner from what had been promised. The only immediate benefit which Somerset gained from the destruction of many of its local charities was, besides the few free schools, the new endowment of the dean and chapter of Wells⁶. It is really astonishing to find how short a time the large sums of money obtained kept Henry out of debt.

long extracts, though not forming a complete series, will serve to

V.

Index of those 'particulars for grants' relating to Somerset which are to be found in the Record Office.

The particulars for grants have been calendared under the names of the would be grantees in Appendix II. to the 9th Report and Appendix II. to the 10th Report of the Deputy Keeper of public records. It will probably assist any who may be searching for documents concerning any particular place to have them rearranged under the respective houses. That at all events is the only excuse for the index appearing here.

CHAPTER IV.

THE EFFECT OF THE DISSOLUTION UPON THE CONDITION OF THE POOR.

‘It is impossible,’ says Father Gasquet¹, ‘to read any account of the work done by monastic institutions for the poor without perceiving in how many directions this present generation has been compelled by very necessity to devise some substitute for the consideration thus exercised.’ But whether the work done by the houses for the poor was really large at all, and whether it was a benefit, have been doubted by very competent observers. The late Prof. Thorold Rogers² however estimated the effect of the monks’ residence highly. Nicholls³, and Burn⁴, admit the fact that a great deal was given away in charity by the orders but attribute the existence of pauperism in no small degree to the system of monastic charity itself. But in truth this imputation can only be true

³ Hist. of the Poor Law, i. 128.

⁴ Historical Dissertation, p. 50. Pilkington says, ‘the hospitality and alms of Abbeys is not altogether to be either allowed or dispraised. The most of that which they did bestow was on the rich, and not the poor indeed, &c.’ (Parker Soc.) 610.

of periods before the xvith century, seeing that there were causes enough for the spread of poverty at that period which the orders had no power and certainly had no will either to help or hinder. Poverty in Henry the Eighth's day meant agricultural poverty, and agricultural conditions are necessarily bound up with the land system. The English land system was changing, and as we shall see when we come to that subject, the relation between landlord and tenant was becoming one of contract instead of one of status. The old personal tie was lost, and with it all its demoralizing advantages, while the benefits of land becoming an article of commerce and subject to the ordinary rules of competition were not as yet perceived. But all this had begun before the dissolution; it was one aspect of the social revolution of the xvith century of which the dissolution was the result; and as is not usual in such cases when the monastic estates were secularized, the movement received an immense additional impetus. The cry throughout the rest of the century is always that rents are being raised and the poor neglected. There are not wanting signs that though as a rule behind the rest of the landowners in their customs, and though also as a rule easy landlords, the convents were beginning to feel the effects of the change which was becoming general, and enclosing commons, and raising rents like their neighbours.

That the dissolution merely brought the question of the poor to a crisis, and by no means originated the difficulty, will be seen from a glance at the History of the Legislation on the subject.

In the 22nd year then of Henry VIII.¹ we have an act directed against the gypsies, a race that has often excited legislation in this country, but small in numbers, and therefore of but small account in an economic sense.

In fact 22 Hen. VIII. c. 12 is the great act on the subject, dealing as it does with all aged and impotent poor people, and making the following regulations².

That every mayor justice bailiff and other officer should take part in a diligent search prosecuted within a district for all 'aged poor or impotent persons which live or of necessity be compelled to live by almes of the charity of the people.' To these at their discretion they might grant licenses to beg within a certain district, and the counterpart of the license must be presented at the court of quarter sessions and kept by the custos rotulorum, so that no man should beg out of his district with impunity, suitable punishments to the extent of whipping being provided for.

The magistrates were also empowered by this statute to punish severely any able-bodied beggars³ whom they should find at large.

¹ 22 Hen. VIII. c. 10. For notes shewing the earlier pressure of poverty see Churchwardens' Accounts (Som. Rec. Soc.), ed. Hobhouse, p. 250. On the general question see the notes on pp. 248 and 249. That the xvth century poverty was due in origin to the break up of the Feudal System there seems no manner of doubt. Cf. Cunningham, Growth of Engl. Ind. and Commerce (Early and Middle Ages), pp. 478 &c., Faucher in Systems of Land Tenure in various Countries (Cobden Club) 325.

² The preamble shews that the pauper difficulty was no novelty as early as this.

³ Reeves' Editor, vol. III. p. 252, considers (improbably) that this refers to the mendicants. Cf. 27 Hen. VIII. c. 27.

This act is very elaborate and curious¹. It is the well-known statute containing the reference to the scholars of Oxford and Cambridge, who were ordered not to go about begging except with the authority of their university, or they would find themselves within the scope of the above provisions.

The next statute² on the subject refers to the last and must be read with it as its complement. It is termed 'An act for punishment of sturdy vagabonds and beggars.' The act of 22 Hen. VIII. had ordered beggars who were arrested out of their settlements, to use a later expression, to be carried back to their proper district, but it did not provide for their maintenance when they got there. This act accordingly begins by laying down that all governors of shires, towns and parishes shall not only receive but keep all aged and impotent poor persons who may be sent back to them³. Further that they shall find work for all the sturdy vagabonds. The collecting of the necessary funds is left very much in the discretion of the officers of the towns. It is suggested that it be done with boxes on Sundays and festivals. All children found in a vagrant condition may be taken and apprenticed, if not diseased, the funds being obtained from the poor-box. The management of the fund is set forth in great detail if there were any fund to manage. The whole basis of the system is ecclesiastical, but it will be noticed that it is the secular and not the regular clergy who have, with the ordinary town officials, the management. Indeed "the common dole" is forbidden¹, its place being taken by aid from a box kept in the church, whose accounts are strictly entered by the churchwardens and parson; no relief being given in money by private persons excepting through this box; it being augmented perhaps by the bequests of the charitable which the parson is instructed to suggest.

¹ The preamble certainly shews that poverty was pressing and extensive in 1531. Vagabonds, it recites, and beggars have of long time increased and daily do increase; and that notwithstanding previous legislation.

² 27 Hen. VIII. c. 25. Between 1541 and 1601 Thorold Rogers (Hist. of Agr. and Prices, v. 820 n.) gives the following statutes: 32 Hen. VIII. cap. 12 (an act as to sanctuary); 37 Hen. VIII. c. 23; 1 Edw. VI. c. 3; 5 and 6 Edw. VI. c. 2; 7 Edw. VI. c. 11; 2 and 3 Phil. and Mary c. 5; 5 Eliz. c. 3; 14 Eliz. c. 5; 18 Eliz. c. 3; 35 Eliz. c. 7; 39 Eliz. c. 3; 43 Eliz. c. 2. (Cf. Ed. of the Statutes of the Realm, Lond. 1819 fol.)

All this before the destruction of the greater houses, though the last act was in the same year as the dissolution of the smaller foundations. There was then a fairly complete poor-law in Henry the Eighth's time, and it was all constructed before the economic effects of the confiscations were felt. Another remark that may be made is that it is strange if the monastic charity were as great as has been represented, that it does not receive more statutory recognition. It is mentioned in this act as something that, like the distribution at great men's houses which is also mentioned, may continue as an auxiliary to the provision made in the act, but everything looks as though it were totally insufficient².

But all this surely points to but one conclusion, namely, the strength of the secular clergy and of the parochial system in the reformation period. The care which was taken to provide for the chantry priests, who were really seculars, as contrasted with the rough way in which the monks were treated, may be ascribed to the same cause. The completeness of the parochial system may best be gathered from published collections of village accounts such as those edited by Bishop Hobhouse¹; if looked into they shew how good the organization of the parish was, how secular, self-supporting, and entirely non-monastic it was, and how natural it was that the poor-law should be built upon the village institutions, and that at first, seeing how well able they were to arrange their own affairs, they should have been left considerable license in the matter.

All the later statutes until that of Elizabeth, 1 Edward VI. cap. 3², 3 and 4 Edward VI. cap. 16, 5 and 6 Edward VI. cap. 2, 2 and 3 Phil. and Mary, c. 5, and the like were but makeshifts as occasion suggested; each differs but slightly from its predecessor and the number of acts and the details of their preambles suggest that they were not fully carried out.

So the statute roll. We have other evidence however that the poverty of the poor was great before the dissolution as well as afterwards. Take Fish's "Supplication for the beggars," published in 1524. After a grievous complaint of the then sad state of the commonwealth he proceeds to attribute it to what he terms "these greedy sort of sturdy idell holy thieves," "a sorte of idell gluttons," and so forth. From Fish's language it may be gathered that he was merely reviling the monks because he knew the reading classes, and was sure of his audience even when addressing the king; an impression confirmed by reading "The supplication of the poore commons," published after the dissolution. His words are those of a scurrilous libeller, but he may be to some extent trusted when he is referring to the state of the country, although disbelieved when enumerating the causes of distress.

The relation of landlord and tenant or the remembrance of it, the strength of the voluntary village gilds¹, to which money was always being left² and which had so important an influence on village life, the charity of the vicars³; all these must have lightened poverty to some extent. Certain it is however that there is no mention in the churchwardens' accounts referred to of money directly applied to relieve the poor, and yet we are equally sure that the poverty was great and increasing and that the monastic charities never extended beyond the immediate range of the monasteries.

Few seem to have noticed the splendid private hospitality of the country gentry of the fifteenth century. Often there were very large wings devoted to the accommodation of casual passers by in the manor houses, of which plenty of evidence remains, indeed the usual plan of building shews how serious a matter hospitality was. In this way the licensed beggar got a shelter on his round from monastery to monastery, and the decay of this promiscuous entertainment doubtless aggravated the sixteenth century distress. The injunctions as to keeping up Hospitality in the latter part of the sixteenth century cannot have been merely caused by a reminiscence of the monastic régime if for no other reason because of the impoverished condition of most of the small houses.

But when every discount¹ is made the provision for the poor that may be termed religious, was considerable. No doubt it was indiscriminate charity, but then the recipients were all as a rule known to the monks and the multitude of small foundations which provided for old age without conveying the chill suggestion which gleams in the modern word workhouse was almost beyond belief.

But to begin with the ordinary houses. An important officer of every convent was the almoner, who had it is true other duties¹ besides his chief duty, which consisted in attending to the interests of the poor. All fragments left at table, as well as special collections, were devoted by him to these objects. He had towards Christmas to lay up a store of shoes and clothes for widows and orphans. In many houses too there were customary oblations from the Abbot or prior which never amounted to less than about five pounds of our money. So important was this matter that a special building or office called the almonry was usually found within the precincts. Its place was next the church and it must not be confounded with the guest-hall, which will be noticed in its charitable aspect directly.

Here approached a long succession of conventual poor, from the nature of things as we have said before they were generally an unchanging body. Often the almoner went out, he was allowed to do so without special leave, and distributed to the necessities of the convent's workpeople, or of the indigent who were particularly recommended to such attention. Bread and meat and clothing were distributed, but also beer². Children appear to have been taught in the Canterbury Almonry, which was very rich.

And if such was the custom it but followed out the rule. All orders required a tenth to be given up in alms. No monk could have anything of his own. The Maundy was often accompanied by a distribution. But all this, as far as theory and early practice go, is matter of common notoriety. The difficulty arises when we have to give a general answer to the question, was the rule observed during the period before the reformation? Perhaps it is almost wise to leave such a problem. Froude asserts that the care of the monks had been to increase their revenues rather than to dispense them¹, an assertion that may have this reply if none other, that the solicitude was but ill rewarded, as a comparison with the valor of the xvth century will shew. The monks must stand or fall in this matter with their general character. If allowance for times and their number be made, it must be admitted that their reputation with the lower classes was good, and that in the matter of charity at all events they were not behindhand multitudes of witnesses testify. All the complaints of the poor, the northern rebels, the Devon rebels, where do they arise from? There must be some ground for the general cry. Why does Layton write from Muchelney complaining of the decay of its hospitality if there were no longer the obligation acknowledged? Again what profit to the monks would there be in the diminishing of the alms when men were so localized that the monks were the only travellers and they not very wide ones, when luxuries were not to be procured however they might be wished for? Is it not more probable that a dozen men would spend rather than save the surplus of a sufficient and corporate income? The probability is then that the monks gave according to their ability. But whether in the changed conditions of their life they had much to give, whether what was given benefitted the district, and whether it benefitted the poor of any wider area are questions to which an answer must be returned in the negative.

We will then first glance at the Somerset houses as great relieving agencies for the poor, leaving for the moment the chantries and fraternities.

A curious manuscript in the British Museum¹ of about the middle of the sixteenth century complains of the loss which Taunton had suffered by the suppression of the priory. It notes that the prior had maintained not only a school but many almshouses, all of which would after the dissolution no longer have the funds necessary for their support.

At Glastonbury² the monks kept by their almoner a hospital for poor and infirm persons, about eight in number. This independently of the magnificent distributions which were made every Wednesday and Friday. Again an Abbot of Glaston founded a similar almshouse for women.

At Bridgewater³ 13 poor persons were permanently kept by the brethren of the hospital of St John.

At Bath the prior built a little hospital and chapel for lunatics. There was also the hospital of St Peter and John the Baptist, one of the few which escaped dissolution⁴.

Apparently there was a leper house at Langport.

At Wells a hospital of monastic foundation for 24 poor men and women. This was not dissolved, but a similar institution dedicated to St John disappeared at the dissolution¹.

Muchelney kept an almshouse and there were others.

Turning to another source of benefit to the poor still however dealing with the regular foundations. In the accounts of almost every monastery there occur definite sums of money set apart for charitable distribution; money usually left for the purpose of which the convent were the administrators. These have been thus tabulated by Bishop Hobhouse²:

² Churchw. Accs. p. 248. Wells cathedral had certain distributions connected with Obits and Anniversaries returned 1 Edw. VI. at £21. 16s. 6d. This belongs of course rather to the Chantry System. At Bridgewater only £1. 13s. was really distributed, but 13 boys and 7 almsmen were maintained. See Wells, Valor Eccl. p. 140: Glaston, V. E. p. 146—7: Bruton, V. E. p. 150: none at Henton, V. E. p. 217: Berlyche, V. E. p. 219: Dunster, V. E. p. 220. It is certainly curious to find Religious Houses so close together. Round Yeovil we have Montacute, Muchelney and Ilchester, and a large chantry at Stoke. It is common enough to find several in one town, which does not argue strongly for their efficiency. The existence of private charities too, when such were rare, in the neighbourhood of large houses points towards inefficiency in the same way as the foundation of grammar schools at towns such as Northampton indicates a want of teaching.

So much for what may be called the funded provision for the poor; the hospitals, directly controlled by convents, and the charitable foundations in their hands; to these we have to add, before we finish with the monasteries, the ordinary dole and the free hospitality to guests. The two run a good deal into one another and the dole has been already noted. Of it all we need say is that in Somerset what information there is, which is very scanty, seems to shew that the attention to this important duty could have been but moderate. Bath, Athelney and Muchelney were financially in difficulties; so Henton and Mynchin Barrow¹. So that they could not do as much almsgiving as they ought to have done. But that in the West of England the practice had vanished no one will assert. If it had been so whence had come the attachment of the common people so signally vindicated in the rebellion of Devonshire? Further we have a record of the Glastonbury distributions. The reception of guests was enjoined on all the orders. We gather that there was a guest-hall in every important monastery with suitable chambers¹. The more important guests were lodged in the one, the ordinary pilgrims and travellers in the other². Founders and their relations could remain a long time with the convent, less privileged persons two days and two nights. A difference existed in the manner of reception, the bells being rung for guests of high rank. Even nuns had to receive visitors, who were only allowed to remain one night in the nunnery, and were served by lay sisters, seeing only the prioress of the regulars³. All this, if it shews nothing else, shews a thorough scheme of hospitality, which in lay houses certainly after the dissolution began to be conspicuous by its absence; and though the 'decay of hospitality' was due to other causes than the dissolution it marks the loss of one of the pleasantest features of mediaeval life which the monks did much to regulate and encourage.

In any case all these buildings such as we read of at Glastonbury, St Albans and Durham, the Hall of one hundred and fifty feet in length at Canterbury, the feastings, the immense consumptions of grain and victuals which can be read in the housekeepers' accounts, all must have meant a great deal of substantial though promiscuous relief to the poor in certain districts¹.

But great though the loss of all this regular and irregular aid might have been, the poor suffered more by the loss of the guilds, fraternities and chantries, and their small assistances, than they did by the doing away with the more magnificent foundations. In all the country villages, in lonely chapelries, in places far from a monastery, and in the larger centres of population, the chantry priest was made the administrator by the charitable of multitudes of small funds. The examples which follow are of course not exhaustive, but they are taken from different parts of the county and serve to shew, as Mr Green² points out, how firm and deep the hold was that the system had taken of the country. They will also excite the remark that the poverty of the poor must have been very terrible when neither the religious provision nor the statutory sufficed for their needs. The Act of Elizabeth was not rendered necessary by the dissolution, but the dissolution itself was effected at the worst possible time for so great an economic change. Hence the great poverty of the years following Edward's accession¹. Hence too the cruelty of the Act of Confiscation which marked the first years of that monarch's reign. It certainly seemed as if the locust was eating what the palmerworm had left and that what was left was but little and the property of the poor.

These examples will shew what the poor lost in return for the vague unfulfilled promises contained in the preamble of the dissolving act. Where they did not lose material comforts of the kind indicated above, they were deprived of the hope of an obit towards which perhaps they had been many years contributing. The way in which this form of service was obtained by the lower orders in Henry's time involved what we should term a benefit club; a number contributing towards the support of a priest who said a certain number of prayers for the souls of such as had died¹. To say that men ought not to be interfered with in such voluntary associations would be to judge the xvith century by the standard of the xixth, but the suppression, in manner at least, was an act which would have been cruel in any age.

The concluding portion of this chapter will not be a long one, an indication that the measures for the benefit of the poor apart from statutory poor-laws were few and unimportant. What was done however during the latter part of Henry's reign and that of his son must be noticed.

The government knew well that the dissolution would mean the decay of hospitality unless some substitute for the monastery could be devised; or perhaps as it appears from what did occur the government wished to satisfy the House of Commons on the subject by a specious measure and then leave things to take their course.

An act of the same year as the first of the dissolution acts, namely 27 Hen. VIII.¹, which will be considered in a subsequent chapter, may be noticed here. It is entitled "An act concerning the decay of houses and enclosures," and it has a slight bearing on the condition of the poor though more on the general mercantile results of the suppression. The effect of the act is to place a penalty on those who lay away tilled land for pasture and suffer dwelling-houses to go to decay. It recited in its preamble the happy effects of such an act on the king's own tenants the reason for his extension of its operation to the whole realm. This basing of the act on the feudal relation shews the hold which such ideas still had on the country. The act looks at the matter a good deal from the labourers' point of view; one might almost say its existence is a proof of that, and it enumerates want of food as among other evils induced by the then state of things.

Far more important is the provision in the act of dissolution itself which runs thus². That all to whom the king's majesty should give any site with the houses thereon builded together with the demesnes of any monasteries that should be dissolved by that act, should be bound by authority of that act to keep an honest continual house and household in the same site or precinct and to occupy yearly as much of the same demesnes in ploughing and tillage of husbandry, that was to say as much of the said demesnes which had commonly used to be kept in tillage by the governors of the same houses, or by their farmers within the time of twenty years next before that act. A penalty was fixed and the justices were to enquire into the matter at sessions, but the whole provision was unreal and never at all events presented any terror to the new holders of the monastic lands¹.

As may be seen from the Statute Roll many towns in the west were in a decaying state². A remedy was attempted, 32 Hen. VIII. c. 19, but this would be of no special benefit to the poor. Rather a burden to them than a benefit, as a certain amount of forced labour would be necessary. Taunton, Bridgewater, Ilchester and Somerton are mentioned.

An act of Edward VI.'s³ reign attempted to check the enclosure of commons which had proceeded with rapidity as soon as the conventual lands had passed into lay hands, and the rage for land-owning, whether it were lawfully or unlawfully obtained, had become general. How unsuccessful this act was many subsequent statutes shew.

¹ Burn, p. 7. It continued on the roll till 21 Jac. I. before it was repealed. That it was a dead letter is shewn by the fact that in the time of Elizabeth very few knew where the monasteries had stood. Amos, A., Statutes of Hen. VIII. p. 299.

² Gross in The Gild Merchant (i. 51-2) attributes this decay of towns in no small degree to the gild system. Cf. Cunningham, Hist. of Engl. Industry and Commerce (Early and Middle Ages), 450-468.

³ 3 and 4 Edw. VI. c. 3.

In 5 and 6 Edw. VI. c. 6, a fresh attempt was made to restrain the conversion of tilled land into pasture, an act which must have been caused by pressure from below.

Such were the few and meagre equivalents that the government offered for the endowments of the poor. It need hardly be insisted on further that a gross and cruel breach of faith was committed by Edward's government. The act itself, not reckoning every honest feeling, expressly saved the rights of those entitled to the chantry pensions and funds, but those rights certainly received no respect. For all the complex chantry machinery we have about three schools and a few vicarages. The work of helping the poor without pauperising them, if it were possible, had to be begun again¹.

As for Henry and his ministers their proceedings were in manner dishonest, and no one will excuse their methods any more. It needed little light on Lee, Layton, Cromwell and their accomplices to dispel the shadowy picture of the Tudor history which has so long been accepted. That light has been given²; and however we may rejoice at the work accomplished, we can only regret the lawless haste in which it was done.

Before this chapter closes a few remarks may be added. The first has regard to the regular monastic charity which it may be well to regard cautiously. If we take an abbey such as Cleeve with an income of £150, it is easy to see that where 27 men and their numerous servants, to say nothing of the fabric and the services, are to be maintained, there will not be a large surplus possible for distribution.

A note or two may be added by way of illustration. Fish in his "Supplication of the poore commons" has a good deal to say about monks. He is not a reliable authority as may be gathered from his abusive language, but he probably fairly correctly represented what he had no inducement to falsify, the miserable condition of the poor in the last years of the reign. Much of the poverty, in his former edition, he attributed to the religious houses; monks he terms "gilted beggars," and now that they are gone he blames them almost as much as before. Then they had, he says, a third of the revenue of the kingdom, now they swell the ranks of the beggars proper. But as the testimony of a hostile writer like Fish is valuable let it be noted that he says:

'For although the sturdy beggers get all the 'deuotio of the good charitable people from them yet 'had the pore impotent creatures some relefe of 'theyr scrappes, where as nowe theye have nothyng.
'Then had they hospitals and almeshouses to be 'lodged in, but nowe they lye and storve in the 'stretes. Then was their number great but nowe
'much greater¹.'

Note.

The monastic provision for the poor has been shewn to have been early contemplated by Law², e.g.

2 Hen. V. c. 1 says that endowments are intended amongst other things "to sustain impotent men and women Lazars men out of their wits and poor women with child and to nourish relieve and refresh other poor people in the same."

It would be hardly fair not to add this note from Toulmin's Hist. of Taunton, p. 94 (Savage's edition).

'An annuity of £—— is yet paid by the Crown 'to the parish of Taunton Saint James, and was no 'doubt intended as a provision for the poor that 'were subsisted at the gates of the monastery, where 'real distress was sure of relief, charity being the 'main principle of these pious institutions.'

CHAPTER V.

EDUCATION.

ENGLAND, says Milman¹, was almost a land of schools. Every cathedral and almost every monastery had its own. Further there were schools presided over by independent masters. Many churches had schools attached to them, the boys learning in the church itself or in the porch. So Mr Drane², who adds that the children of the rich had a chaplain as well as the old henchman deputed to look after their studies. It is in fact certain that the main part of the education in pre-reformation times was clerical. And this is not affected by the fact that a few endowed schools had been founded. But the real difficulty is to know whether there really was much teaching done, whatever may be the tradition. It is certain that there was some. For instance when Lilleshull was dissolved we find among the accounts³ 'It to iiij^{or} gentylmens sones.....xiij s iiij d,' given doubtless to help them to get home again. And Father Gasquet, in an article, in a recent number of the Downside Review, upon Abbot Cooke of Glastonbury, mentions the testimony of an old man who had been brought up there. Throughout the middle ages the monks must have had some system of teaching or how is the testimony of so many of their scholars to be accounted for? Certainly the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge were monastic in organisation; they are so still in fact; and nothing is more sure than that by way of exhibition the Houses supported poor scholars at the various Colleges¹. Thorold Rogers² says 'I am convinced that they (schools) were attached to every monastery, and that the extraordinary number of foundation schools established just after the Reformation of 1547 was not a new zeal for new learning, but the fresh and very inadequate supply of that which had been so suddenly and disastrously extinguished.' And again in 1562 the Speaker of the House of Commons drew a doleful picture of the state of Education in England.

'And being encouraged by these like examples, and others, to enter into some abuses used in this realm, I will only speak of three, being all three notable monsters—Necessity, Ignorance, and Error. Necessity is grown amongst ourselves, so that no man is contented with his degree, though he hath never so much; but where she is (as the proverb saith) she has no Law; for how now be all schools, benefices, and other like rooms furnished, and yet those for schools so few, that I dare say a hundred schools want in England which before have been? And if in every school there had been but an hundred scholars, yet that had been ten thousand; so that now I doubt whether there be so many learned men in England, as the number wants of these scholars.

² Six Centuries of Work and Wages, I. 165.

The second monster is her daughter Ignorance; for want of ten thousand scholars which these schools were the bringers up of, and want of good school masters, bringeth Ignorance; but the occasion of these two monsters, is for want of livings and preferments; for covetousness hath gotten the livings, as by impropriations, which is a decay of learning. For by it the tree of knowledge groweth downwards, and not upwards, as it was first meant, and made for; and groweth thereby greatly to the dishonour both of God and this Commonwealth. The Universities are decayed, and great market towns, and others without either school or preacher; for the poor vicar hath but only twenty pound, and the rest being no small sum is impropriate; and so thereby no preacher there, but the people being trained up and led in blindness for want of instructions become obstinate¹.

This speech is remarkable on more grounds than the allusion to education. It is a striking testimony to the misery which the new era of contract at first of necessity introduced; everyone looked backward to what pleased him best in the past without real-¹ Dewes's Journal, ed. 1682, 64, 65. With this may be compared Starkey's Letter alluded to in the last chapter. Starkey had begged Henry to apply part of the dissolution profits to education. izing how impossible it was for the old relations to continue; in fact without realizing that the change had come before they had appreciated the fact, and that the dissolution was one of its earliest and greatest results.

Bishop Hobhouse¹ says that in the way of popular education he cannot find any trace of the convents conferring any benefits. This opinion is certainly to some extent confirmed by what information we have as to the period just before the reformation. The chantry priests were too often 'indifferently learned,' all wills appear to have been drawn up by the priest², the accounts which are so numerous were the work of the bailiff, the churchwardens regularly paid someone to write what they obviously could not read³. But still the question cannot be considered as a settled one as to monks; nuns most people allow to have done a good deal of teaching⁴. The tradition was present, was it acted on or was it not? A good many difficulties would be solved by simply believing that the majority of monks were too ignorant to teach; and certainly some were so, perhaps many. That there were frequent breaches of the Rules is clear, but this is by no means sufficient.

Every monastery where teaching was carried on had to deal with two classes of boys, those intended for a religious life, often presented at a very early age¹, and those who meant neither vows nor orders. The former must have been present in every monastery that was to continue its numbers, and the office of master of the novices was a very important one². It must be held by an old man who saw that the novices wanted nothing and by the Norman Institutes shaved the boys and the boys him. The master had to wash the very little boys also³.

As to others; as well as novices there were always a good many children about a monastery. The family life of the monks was made a subject of satire by the profane. Boys for the choir were there and people's children from the neighbourhood. Tanner⁴ says plainly that every convent had some one appointed for the purpose of Education and that all the neighbours might have their children taught grammar and church music free of charge. Probably all were taught in the 'song school' of which the following description is given. "This school was built within the church, and was neatly wainscotted within round about two yards high, and had a desk from one end of the school to the other to lay their books on. The floor was boarded for warmth and round about it long forms were fastened in the ground for the children to sit on: and the place where the master sat and taught was all close boarded for warmness. His office was to teach the six children to sing and play on the organs every principal day when the monks sang their high mass, and at even song; * * *. The master had his chamber adjoining to the song school, where he lodged, and his diet in the Prior's Hall, among the Prior's gentlemen, and his other necessities were supplied at the common charge¹."

What was taught? Grammar and church music we have had; this for the neighbours' children, perhaps more music practical as well as theoretical for the choir than the rest². The novices were again on another footing. Their training was a matter of rule, and though, as has been said, monasteries were founded to be academies of virtues rather than sciences, a good deal else than virtue was learned; not merely grammar, writing and psalmody, but much more practical matters, accounts, in early times fortification even, at all times handicrafts of one sort and another³. Bulls were sometimes necessary in the middle ages to get monks to write¹, but they took more kindly to hunting, building and architecture, and above all metal work, for which Glastonbury was famed². Manners too were very fairly attended to³.

If a novice were apt at learning he must be sent to the university, not an expensive course in those days, especially if the scholar eked out his allowance by begging. The great monasteries had special lodgings for the members of their houses while in residence at Oxford and Cambridge⁴. Beyond all doubt the monks did some work in the country in the way of familiarising the people with scholarship and encouraging such as took kindly to it.

The method of teaching has been represented as harsh and dreary, so wanting in humanity because so little of a humanizing tendency was taught. Thus Compayré⁵, while quoting many exceptions, speaks of the pre-renaissance system of education. Drane⁶ however does not think so, and all we know of the Benedictines who were great schoolmasters makes us agree with the latter view. Beating there was, and a good deal of it for the novices. "They were beaten in their chapter," says Fosbrooke⁷, as though it were common; and again, "when the Abbot was present "in the choir, no one beat or stripped them without "his leave; but in his absence the chantor might "correct them in matters relating to his office, and "the Prior where they behaved with levity," which looks as though the rod was frequently used. "There "is no other difference, except that the rods in the "fifteenth century are twice as long as those in the "fourteenth¹."

The choir had hard work, often night services and the like, while the novices had to wait at table and to attend to the sempectae. The food was liberal; meat always till the boy was fourteen. If the monks had been cruel it is not likely that we should find so many young people employed in the monasteries. Drane² gives a pleasant little couplet from some monastic fragments, which says a good deal for the kindness of the fathers—

Wrath of children son be over gon,
With an apple parties be made at one.

But it is obviously idle to blame the monks for not teaching more than was commonly known in their day³. On the other hand it may be noted that the class which in all probability had had most knowledge of their life, by an elementary education in the Religious Houses, was afterwards the very class but for reliance on which, Henry would have found his task, for the time, impossible. Nothing is more striking than the complete want of any standard of morality, as distinguished from mere dogma, which is observable in the 'Letters and Papers', 'A good servant to his grace', and 'a good husband' and 'one who keeps good hospitality' we often have. Good men from the point of view of our own day are referred to rather with pity than approbation. It seems clear on the whole that Mr Gairdner struck the true note in pointing out the strength of the notion of allegiance. This, the relic of the Feudal Age, intensified by the belief that Henry's cause meant England's cause, and coupled with an observation of the practical advantages of following Henry, overpowered every other feeling; gratitude, parental affection, vows, all were forgotten. That it was so says little for the religious teaching of the time; or perhaps it shews rather how the teacher taught what he was wanted to teach, and reflected the tendencies of the age in which he lived.

These complaints which appear in the Survey have received a guarantee from their very presence there, being as it were backed up by the commissioners themselves. They disclose a certain need which was but poorly attended to.

A free grammar-school was founded in Bath out of part of the possessions of the dissolved abbey in the year 1553. It was a small school intended for ten poor boys and connected with a kind of almshouse. That it has since become more important is due of course to the increased value of the land from which the income was derived¹.

The Bridgwater grammar-school, which was also free, was not established till 1561 by Queen Elizabeth. It may claim a connection with the monasteries in that it was maintained by a charge on the tithes. That charge was fixed and the school necessarily languished until assisted by private donations².

Bristol has not hitherto been treated as belonging to Somerset, but it may be mentioned that the great free-school there was of private foundation, by the will of Thomas Thorne, although it is true that it was endowed with lands of a hospital which the executors probably got at a cheap rate³.

Bruton, as we have just seen, sent up a petition, and was further one of the few places which benefited by so doing. The old school was re-established on a slightly larger scale; its revenues were £11. 5s., and it struggled on till the present time⁴.

Crewkerne free-school was not of Edward's foundation though of his time. It has nevertheless been about the most successful school in the county⁵.

Edward himself founded Frome school in the Forest of Selwood, endowing it with £6 per annum, to which some five pounds more was afterwards added. By endowment this school is connected with other charities, showing that the pre-Reformation ideas were not forgotten⁶.

Of the remaining schools Ilminster was founded in Edward's reign, Langport and Martock were restoration foundations. Taunton grammar-school is said to have been founded by Fox, Bishop of Winchester¹, in 1522, who gave the appointment of its master into the hands of New College, Oxford. He failed however to appoint any fund towards the salary of the said master, from which circumstance Wm. Walbee, a clerk who died in 1554 leaving money for that purpose, may be said to be the second founder². But no part of the funds came from Taunton Priory, which passed from Colthurst, the original grantee, to the Mores and thence to the Winters³.

There is some credit in the above recital, but very little. Edward was not so rapacious as his father and he was but little kinder. From the chantries he secures a revenue of over £900 a year, while £25 would cover the total annual value of all his Somerset educational foundations.

CHAPTER VI.

AGRICULTURE, LABOUR AND PRICES¹.

THE feature of the Agriculture of the sixteenth century which strikes one first perhaps is the immense importance which it had in comparison with other industries. There are obvious reasons for this, and it is very generally acknowledged by writers from Fitzherbert's day to our own. Among the reasons which may be enumerated for the prominent position which husbandry occupied in the sixteenth century are such as the following. It was a wool period, hence a period to some extent of large farms. Much was done then on an estate which would not be attempted now, such as brewing, the annual saltings of meat, and the making of clothes. Further, agricultural products were the staple articles of export. One must add too that owing to the system of farming more men were required than is the case now, one of the effects of which must have been to give prominence to the farmsteads as centres of their little districts.

¹ See for this subject Thorold Rogers' Six Centuries of Work and Wages and History of Agriculture and Prices; also Dr Cunningham's Hist. of British Industry and Commerce, sec. v.

There is no doubt that in early times the monks were the greatest benefactors to agricultural communities that could have been devised. One is afraid that the letting of their farms must have interfered with this just before the dissolution. In earlier times there was plenty of vigour. 'Teachers of Agriculture,' says Thorold Rogers¹; perhaps that to some extent in all ages. The Benedictines, of whom Somerset was full, were always famed for husbandry, as were the Cistercians for wool. The rules encouraged all this, especially in the days when Misericorde was not so common. We read of very sumptuous monastic feasts, often held by a strained construction and avoidance of the monastic code, which must like even the ordinary feeding of such large establishments have necessitated great management of supplies². If the rule were not broken there was every inducement to attend to fowl-keeping; we may note that it was attended to from the fifteenth century pigeon-house. Fish-culture was undertaken considerably. One notes in the Glastonbury Certificate the "Games of Swans," "Game of Fish," and so forth.

¹ Six Cents. of Work and Wages, p. 362. But let it be remembered that the abbots came in for a certain amount of condemnation in respect of the sheep-breeding question. A Quarterly Reviewer says, "The suppression of monasteries by Henry the 8th "is frequently represented as the cause of much of the misery "which prevailed among the labouring classes of that period, but "the effect of this measure on the poor is grossly exaggerated. "It ought to be recollected that the monasteries fed only those "who were poor and idle already; whereas the engrossing system" (he means making one large farm out of several small ones) "made thousands idle who had formerly been industrious. We "see moreover from Sir Thomas Moore himself that many of "the monastic establishments had themselves adopted the new "system; 'Holy Abbots also,' he distinctly says, 'had cleared "away and discarded their tenantry to make room for sheep.'"

This writer, however, considers the period which follows the Elizabethan poor law as one of the happiest in the annals of our rural population, which is more than doubtful.

Road making is attributed to the orders¹, and when they went the complaints as to the filth of the highways begin to be frequent; but these were rather occasioned by neglect consequent on the decay of the country towns. But there was little driving in Henry's time, so that a road would be much more easily kept in order than in the eighteenth century.

We hear much of monastic gardens². "This done (prime) we are sent to work in a garden, to work and delve for near two hours more," says one who thought it a hardship. He should have remembered that under some rules the working and delving continued till vespers³. Complaints are made that at one house the monks are allowed against the injunctions of the visitors "to have portions, pensions and private gardens⁴."

Granges or country farms, far away, were common, shewing a love for rural life; indeed it was often complained that when an abbot got off to one of these pleasant places it was very difficult to make him come back to his convent⁵. Fosbrooke tells of a Norman abbot who whiled away two whole years in Devonshire this way. The monks then at some periods were active farmers or directors of farm work. Amusing regulations occur, designed to keep them at work and yet preserve their modesty. Women must milk in the fields, not in the monastery, and if possible they are to be neither young nor pretty. Carpenters, bricklayers and those whose work lay aloft to wear breeches¹, naked legs being always considered injurious to sanctity, as may be seen from Fosbrooke's account of the sleeping attire; breeches and bed socks.

When all the pleasant monastic system disappeared, Somerset would probably suffer more than most counties: from its remote position it would not be much visited, and it had more than its share of monasteries. Perhaps the long stagnation of agriculture as an art is in some measure a result of the dissolution. Rogers says that little progress was made in agriculture throughout the sixteenth century². But this rather probably arose from the fact that the monks just before the dissolution, and for some little time before it, let most of their farms, and managed those they had on their hands by "surveyors³." Had they been devoted to farming personally much more would have been found out as to cropping and stock and, above all, manuring. As it was it is well known that there was but little difference in the mode of cultivating adopted by a tenant-farmer in Henry's reign from that used under ¹ Fosb. Brit. Mon. Those in the fields need not come home to service but say some short prayers there.

³ Fitzherbert has a book on these surveyors.

Edward the Fourth. It was in James the First's time that the great advance was made. Dissolution does not necessarily mean lower farming either. A new man will farm as well as the old one if he means to stay long and, as most of the leases were respected, the man in actual occupation of the land was often not changed at all. Still a great many of the Somerset houses became farms instead of mansions, such as Muchelney and Taunton, and others went to great men who were rarely long in the country, so that it seems likely that the old régime might have done more had it continued, especially as time went on the pressure of the debasement told on the fixed customary rents which made up the incomes of the convents so largely. The influence of such a large body of country gentlemen as the monasteries contained was an educating influence in any case.

That things were very stationary can be seen from the two editions of Fitzherbert¹, the one published in 1539, and the other, said to be amended and added to, in 1562. The latter has little that the former has not; after going carefully through them both it will be found that practically there is no difference, although twenty very important years had elapsed, and although the title suggests that if there had been anything new to learn it would have appeared.

The only new branch of agriculture which was introduced during Henry VIII.'s time was the cultivation of the hop². At a period when no tea was in use this was a matter of some importance, but not as affecting the monks, who were gone before the cultivation became general. Their drink had been beer, occasionally wine, chiefly of this country. Wine from grapes was occasionally made¹.

² Th. Rogers, Ag. and Prices, iv. 57.

The monks, as has been suggested, were just before the dissolution but little in contact with the practicalities of agriculture. And that because of the leasing that was common. The revenues came from rent paid by free or customary tenants or by leaseholders; even the conventual farm itself was often leased. Still there was more than might be supposed from this account to interest the monastery people in the details of cultivation. For one thing, they continued a method of letting termed land and stock leasing after lay owners had given it up. Further, a great deal of their income was to the last paid in kind, especially as money was scarce before the debasement; Chantry priests got a good part of their living paid in kind, whether it were valued in that way or not. But then again the monastery people at all events leased these kind payments where they could. Leases of corn tithe for instance are common.

Deduct as one may, all this managing shews considerable intricacy of accounts and general aptitude, especially in connection with the tithes from mills and woods.

The secular manager was very common. Mr Soper, of Taunton, did all the superintendence for the monks at Athelney, getting forty shillings a year for the work. From the results of his managing it seems as though he made but a poor business of it¹. There was plenty of private weaving, but though we hear of it all over Wiltshire and Gloucestershire, and right down in the south near Crewkerne, it is never in connection with the church authorities. The monks in fact were languid. At Glastonbury, as the letter of Fitz James shews, the letting of the farms was given into the hands of one of the brethren, who was probably a highly educated lawyer.

The dissolution, by scattering all the estates, the tithes to this man, a pension or fee farm rent to that, and the land again to one and the stock on it to another, did a good stroke perhaps for the country, but tended, by enriching the rich and rendering leases invariable where formerly only common, to take away the wealthy classes from agriculture as a pursuit. The stock being of so much value too, made the yeoman prefer to lease rather than own his farm, leading, taken together with the debased coinage and the concentration of holdings, to the overthrow of the yeoman class altogether. It is quite certain that the very rich man no longer farmed more than a very small part of his land. Just below that class there was a good resident gentry, the Westerns and Allgoods, but they again did not farm as a business.

The consequence was the long-continued backwardness of the country districts, of which stagnation there are abundant proofs¹. The Somerset plough which Fitzherbert talks about was very slowly abolished. The mattock long remained the great instrument of cultivation. The marshes continued in their wild state until quite modern times, and it does not seem as though the sea were kept out yet. Great forests, which were regularly planted, especially by the higher classes, as an investment, long continued to annoy the inhabitants, as may be seen from a petition from the inhabitants of Petherton that their crops be not spoiled by the too numerous deer in the royal wood there. That there was a great deal of land not properly cultivated may be seen from the great variations in the rents paid to the chantries in the beginning of Edward the VI.'s reign for pieces of ground of similar areas.

It is no doubt a simple way of solving a difficulty to assume that the decline in the prosperity of the working classes, which went on in the sixteenth century, was a direct result of the dissolution, but there is every reason to suppose that such was not the case. Fish complained of the growing poverty both before and after the suppression, and there is no reason for supposing that the fact of the monastic estates changing hands did more than accentuate a change in the relation of employer to employed, which was itself connected with movements of nearly a hundred years' growth. The break up of the feudal system, the larger introduction of the element of competition into the labour world, the holding of large farms on lease, will sufficiently account for the consequent misfortunes of the labourer, and all this had been spreading during the whole of Henry's reign and before it. The disappearance of the convents formed a convenient peg upon which men who found themselves harder driven by new masters could hang complaints, and the tendency to attribute grievances to concurrent rather than connected events is not confined to any century¹.

The effect of the dissolution on the position and life of the agricultural labourer must in the end have been largely beneficial, though attended in the immediate results with much misery. It is a commonplace to say that such has been the effect of every great economic change. There was here no tendency, as in France, to ultimately produce a class of peasant proprietors. No one means that, when he says of the dissolution that it brought more land into the market. But there was a tendency towards a weakening of the manorial jurisdiction, and much of the wretchedness which filled the reign of Mary was due to the corresponding loss of the advantages of the manorial relation before there was any well regulated scheme to take its place. If the certificate of the surveyors of the king's lands which concerns Glastonbury¹ be looked over, it will be seen that a great many men are returned there as unfree. That is to say, in almost every manor of that noble property we have, after the enumeration of the rents of assize, demesnes let out to farm, woods, parks and commons, a heading 'Able men to serve the King,' which from the context must refer to the ordinary able-bodied free population below the rank of gentlemen. There then follows another paragraph which runs thus :—

“Bondmen.

“Also there are appertaining unto the said
“manor certain men called bondmen whose bodies “and goods are always at the king's pleasure as “lord thereof to the number of—”

At Glastonbury there were 14 such, at Mere 15, and so on. In Somerset, connected with this abbey alone there were 97 returned in the above manner. Now it cannot be doubted that these praedial serfs would reap some benefit from the change of masters². We know that they had all been emancipated by the time of James the First.

As to wages. Here again it is difficult to speak with accuracy, or even with a meaning. All that is said in the following lines must be understood of those labourers whose wage was their living. For many gave part of their time in return for their cottages, and there was more payment in kind than this; much wood given, much food. The general conclusion to which Thorold Rogers comes is this: that the fifteenth century and the first part of the sixteenth was the golden age of the labourer, if we take into account the relation of his wages to the cost of the necessities of life. There was an eight hours day, and no apparent difference in rate whether the employment were for a long or a short period¹. It is not difficult to account for all this. As to the high wages, the coinage was still fair, and the labourers few because of the plague and the wars; moreover, custom had far greater influence on prices than it had in the middle of the sixteenth century. As regards the rate of wages. Again it has to be insisted on that, if this were the golden age of English labour, it was also a period of customary wages. That this was so needs no proof; an illustration of it may be found in the power of London Guilds of the time in the matter². And few men would be employed for short periods in the country, the relation of master and servant being still in a way a feudal one: who will say for instance that rent in the fifteenth century was not marked by something more than the modern idea of purchase of accommodation? it was in fact a feudal payment.

² Of course the number of workmen was limited in London. Probably too there was as much difference in the sixteenth century as there is now between the country and the town labourer. For it is curious to find the lowest class labourers fully organized; the Hugglers were certainly formed into gilds, cf. Hobhouse, Churchwardens' Accounts, 251.

The rate¹ of wage throughout this high period was something like 6*d.* per day for artizans, and 4*d.* for agricultural labourers, who received 6*d.* however in time of harvest¹.

It is curious then in the full view of all this prosperity to suddenly come across complaints of the decay of agriculture. The reasons for this were various.

The enclosure of commons was an introduction of the 15th rather than the 16th century, but perhaps was not much noticed then on account of the general prosperity of the working classes. But it was noticed. And in the 16th we have a long series of Acts upon the subject, shewing that it was felt to be a grievance. There is no doubt that it was a distinct subtraction, whose value could be measured in money, from the incomes of the labourers. At the present time if a freeman of a town with a common, such as Newcastle, has a right of pasture for one cow, it is worth at least £10 a year; and the loss of such a privilege is a serious one to a workman's family.

¹ Thorold Rogers, Six Cents. of Work and Wages, cap. xii. passim. It may easily be believed that the rates of wages in pre-Reformation times are often deceptive, because of the large number of villeins. Free labour may have been scarcer and dearer than we suppose. Of course the effect of the Black Death was all important.

But very important was the rise in prices. Between 1520 and 1600 there was a great difference in the price of the ordinary articles of diet and clothing, a difference due, in the last years of the century as Mr Rogers has pointed out¹, to the inflow of foreign silver, making the money of the country have far less purchasing power than it had, whatever were the power of the government in forcing a token coinage on the people. Just at the critical period came Henry's debasement of 1543, the effects of which were incalculable. Although prices were rising fast, wages, as is always the case, were only rising slowly, and when they had to contend with both the rise in price and the debased coinage, but one result could follow, which was loss to the working classes. Had the old currency remained wages, especially as in time the effect of the dissolution in breaking down customary labour began to be felt, would have accommodated themselves to the altered state of the silver market. As it was, the dissolution did something by the time of Elizabeth, but everything was against the workman, a paternal government, no organized unions of any kind, gross ignorance, that utter incapacity for more than one branch of industry with which the modern admirers of the mediaeval craftsman are so fascinated. No more labour was required, one would think rather less, as villeinage became extinct. The monks with their charities, uneconomic, but comforting, were gone. The guilds were gone too, the only benefit societies then dreamed of, and the only institutions which trained the operative in habits of combination. Altogether the middle of the century was a time of great misery¹.

The following extract from 2 and 3 Ph. and Mary, c. 12, seems to point to a want of agricultural work:—

“An Act for the sealing and viewing of cloths commonly called Bridgwaters.

“Where before this time the boroughs and towns of Bridgewater, Taunton and Chard, in the County of Somerset have been well and substantially inhabited, occupied, maintained and upholden for the most part by reason of the making of woollen clothes, commonly called Bridgewater, Taunton and Chard clothes, which in time past were much desired as well beyond the seas as in the realm of England, and thereby the inhabitants and poor people of the said boroughs and towns and of the country thereabouts, were daily set on work and had sufficient living by the same, and where also the said towns in times past were of great force and strength to serve the King and Queen's highness' progenitors and ancestors kings of this realm: (2) forasmuch as of late days divers persons inhabiting and dwelling in villages, hamlets and small towns of husbandry in the said County of Somerset, which were never prentices or skilful in making of the said clothes as well for their private wealths and commodity as also because they would be out of due search of their clothes to be made according to the statute therefore provided, not regarding the maintenance of the said boroughs and towns nor the commonwealth of the handicraftsmen and other poor people which chiefly had their living and sustenance by making of the said cloth, have of late days exercised, used and occupied the mysteries of cloth-making weaving fulling and shearing within their houses, and have so deceitfully made wrought and stretched the said clothes to the infamy and slander of cloth-making in such sort and manner that not only the same sorts of clothes are grown out of estimation, but also the said towns are in great decay ruin and depopulation.”

“II. For remedy wherefor be it enacted by the authority of this present parliament That no person whatsoever inhabiting or which shall hereafter inhabit within the said county shall after

It is difficult to assert anything very certainly about the prices in the Tudor period as influenced by the dissolution. The personal property of the monks of Somerset which was sold in the county was not enough to cause any disturbance in the general range, and besides, there was such poor furnishing all over in good houses and bad, that all the monastic chattels were at once absorbed. All, that is to say, that did not go up to London, whence a good deal that was precious was exported. The price of land will be glanced at in the next chapter, but there must be a certain relation between land and stock, if indeed, as has been said, all prices be not functions of the price of land. The stock of the monasteries, where did it go? This brings too the question of the land and stock lease in its train. The monks, like the colleges, continued the land and stock lease in a few cases right down to the dissolution time. This tenure was an anachronism. It succeeded the system of the landlord farming with gangs of labourers and provided for a time when it was absolutely necessary that the landlord should furnish the stock. From the circumstance of this form of holding still subsisting, it follows that a much larger proportion of cattle passed into the royal hands than would have done from a corre-

the feast of the purification of our Lady next coming commonly called Candlemas put to sale any kind of such clothes as is aforesaid, or clothes of like nature making and sort made or to be made within the said county, except such cloth be first viewed, searched and seen in one of the boroughs or towns aforesaid, whether the same be perfectly and truly made according to the statute, &c."

sponding confiscation of lay estates. We know that a good deal of this stock remained long on the hands of the sovereign, through Edward the Sixth's reign at all events. The effect of this must have been to lessen any effect which a large forced sale might have had, though we may fairly surmise that all the chantry cattle were sold off at once.

That the dissolution produced no very sudden impression on the general range of prices may be inferred on several grounds.

In the first place, agriculture being stagnant, rents did not rise at once in any great degree, and a steady condition of the land market would be a counteracting influence opposed to any sudden depression.

In the second place, there was nothing in the fact of corporate property passing into the hands of private owners which would make one suspect any great alteration. The private owners tried, it is true, to raise rents, but they were not very successful. Perhaps the farming was worse if anything after the dissolution than before: such appears to be Rogers'¹ opinion. This does not imply that the doing away with the stock leases, for instance, did not depress a considerable number of farmers into the class of labourers, but they again ought never to have been tenant-farmers in the then condition of things.

Thirdly, the influx of silver outweighed all local causes.

The wardens' accounts from which the above are taken give perhaps the best picture of English village life in the sixteenth century. The most prominent feature of the parochial life is its centring round the village church; and while the traces of monastic influence are singularly small, if indeed present at all, there is from the earliest times ample evidence of that power of local elective self-government which has been probably the secret of the ability with which the constitutional struggles in this country have always been conducted. One of the parishes whose records are preserved, Morebath, was impropriated to Barlynch Priory, but the connection appears to have been merely viewed as a source of revenue to the convent. In 1534 a silver chalice was stolen from the church, but we find no record of the Priory assisting to purchase a new one. We do find however that 'ye yong men and maydyns of ye parysse dru them selffe togethers and w^t there gyfts and provysyon the bofth (bought) yn another challis w^t owt ony chargis of ye parysse.' Eighty-one subscribers contributed 30s., equivalent to £30 of our money¹. This is not the place to note the activity of the self-supporting, and more than self-supporting, guilds; but nothing can be clearer than the immense loss which the labourer sustained by their abolition, a loss not so much of money as of an aid to thrift and of a principle of association which made life pleasanter, while it did much to make the want of the workhouse unfelt.

Two accounts are given here; the first is that of the expenses of Thomas Ede, warden of St John Baptist's, Pilton, during the year 1515, when important repairs were in progress.

CHAPTER VII.

THE TENURE AND DISTRIBUTION OF LAND AND ITS VALUE.

ON what tenure did the monasteries hold their land? The usual answer is that they held it in frankalmoign or free alms, a kind of holding known on both sides of the Channel before the Conquest. It is to be wished that the matter were as simple as this. Cruise¹ says that most of the monasteries and religious houses held by this tenure, and yet nothing is more certain than that it was one of William's great changes to make the abbots and priors do fealty and hold fees by knight service². Still Wright³, who certainly speaks with authority, talks of monks as unable to hold proper feuds, while in every account it is manifest that there were money services in the way of rents yearly paid by the monks to one and another. It might be thought that the original grants were many of them in knight service, but that as time went on a great number of estates were left with no other condition than that prayer should be offered for the soul of the giver, and the fact that a power of distraint existed if such services were not duly kept up supports this view. It is clear that many ecclesiastics held by knight service, as Prof. Maitland notes in the essay referred to¹. Thus it will be seen that the point is not quite clear. It may be suggested however that frankalmoign appears to have been possible although a small rent was paid², or rather that land was let to monks at a very low rent, and in this way probably, together with a great deal of land held in socage, would the monastic estates be chiefly held. That the monks were great buyers of land is not probable, they had far too much given to them to be that³, but still they must have bought some estates, and others they would acquire so that they held them on the same terms as the former owner. This will perhaps account for most of the payments which they had to make, though there must have been a constant tendency for such payments to cease.

An example of a gift in frankalmoign is easily furnished.

Some of the charters reserve a rent¹. For example, in 1335 letters patent were issued setting forth that William Earl of Salisbury, lately deceased, had given the manor and hundred of Dulverton with all its appurtenances by his indenture to the prior and convent of Taunton, to be held in fee farm by them and their successors on their paying to the said Earl and his heirs £10 a year: that the said Earl had founded the monastery of Bustlesham and had enriched it with sundry manors, lands, tenements and rents: that he had given to that monastery the sum of ten marks out of the aforesaid £10, and the remaining five marks to the custos of the chapel at Donyate, and that the Prior of Taunton had to pay to each, the ten and the five marks respectively, and so forth².

This illustrates not merely the reservation of a rent, but also the way in which the small pensions, of which every monastic balance sheet can shew specimens, arose, and again it shews how easy it was for a reserved rent to be assigned to some religious use³. A glance at the valor will shew how many religious foundations were charged with payments to each other, over and above what one may term mortgages, such as appear in the Abbot of Athelney's schedule⁴.

² Hugo, Hist. of Taunton Priory, 45.

³ Charters are often found releasing rents that had been reserved.

⁴ It is curious, by the way, to notice in that schedule how the Abbot is ready to bind the house for debts which mainly arose from his own mismanagement.

At the dissolution there were multitudes of these rents left, indeed no one who has ever looked at the valor can hold the opinion that the monks got their lands for nothing. The undying grip of a corporation, the rule¹, the crusades², the piety of twenty generations; all these were assisting influences in favour of the monks, but they had not extinguished the customary payments by any means. Take an example from the accounts of Taunton Priory, which appear in Hugo as reprinted from the valor.

³ This word indicates that a return in kind or services has become fixed. It properly refers to rents which have been fixed for good and all, subjected to commutation either by agreement or prescription, in fact returns for land which the Lord cannot hope to take in the variable way which he did in the days before they were assized.

The dissolution came and it has often been assumed that all the manors were granted out free of this complex burden of small annuities. But this cannot have been so. Just before the majority of the houses were dissolved we find that an immense number of grants were made by the various convents, in the hope presumably of staving off destruction, as they are made to notable people in the district. All these appear in the decrees of the court of Augmentation. Cleeve and Worspring for instance give pensions, money, sinecure offices, such as stewardships of manors, advowsons, and to such people as the Sydenhams of Brimpton, Sir John Seyntlo, and the Luttrells¹. We may be sure that these would be respected. We may be sure, that is to say, that any subsequent grant would be made subject to them, in fact the third section of the Act of 1535 expressly reserved the rights of such persons. And yet there is no doubt that where it could be done grants would be secured free of these troublesome outgoings².

As to the tenure by which the grantees held, in some cases it was socage³, generally so in fact, a point of great importance, as will be seen later. And where expressed otherwise it was often really socage⁴. Thus Humphrey Colles took a great part of the possessions of Canyngton nominally for the service of the fortieth part of a knight's fee, but practically at a small rent, resembling a quit rent, and fixed¹.

Still monastic property had never been quite the same as other property. It was more mixed. The great tithes often went with the estate and then came the obligation to support a chaplain², which many would try to avoid. But after all the tenure of those who received grants was not a matter which concerned the happiness of the people nearly so much as did the conditions of letting to those who were in actual occupation of the soil.

The property of the monks, as may be seen from the valor, consisted in all kinds of holdings. As far as concerned the tenant, the manorial relation is still the great relation, and we have only to go through an example to shew the significance of the valor's terse and abbreviated description.

The meaning of this small account will be perfectly clear to those who are accustomed to look over Court Rolls. The king's surveyors in the course of their peregrination through the diocese of Bath and Wells have arrived at the deanery of Taunton, in the Archdeaconry of the same name. They have to make a return of the yearly value of Taunton priory. The great roll of the convent property is produced, and so far as relates to Esse and Westowe it is pronounced correct and copied into those note-books which afterwards formed the celebrated Valor Ecclesiasticus. But as to Middleton. Here the convent holds a manor ; they are lords of the manor of Middleton in fact, a manor consisting, as all the old books used to have it, in demesnes and services. Demesnes are those lands which the lord, when the manor is first granted to him, keeps in his own hands. And it was necessary for him to have a good deal of demesne for many reasons ; such as the fact of there being no suitable tenants to whom he could grant it out to ; or perhaps because it was as well to keep a good deal in his own hands so as to reward any one in future times who served him faithfully ; or again he might be fond of agriculture, or the only person rich enough to farm good land properly. All this before the days of Edward the First. But the monks who possessed many manors, how did they manage the demesne lands in each ? The answer is that they did not manage them at all, but as since the Act of 18 Edw. I. they could not grant any more of the demesne out to free tenants in the old way, making the same tenants thereby owners, they used to lease the demesne lands out to farmers. But at Middleton this usual course was only partially followed. The demesne farm was partly let for 12 shillings a year, and the rest, which the commissioners valued at £10 a year, they kept in their own hands, farming it by an agent or bailiff whose salary of forty shillings is duly deducted from the proceeds of the estate. So much for the demesne, the nucleus of the manor. It ought, we may observe, to have had a manor house upon it, and would have had if it had been the property of a layman; this non-residence being one of the evils of the monastic system. Sometimes there was the house, but it was let, or perhaps the bailiff, a man like Stephen Stroude, lived in it.

A manor consisted, we have said, of demesnes and services. We have dealt with the former and now turn to the services of the tenants. These tenants hold land of one of two kinds; that is to say, they either hold by free tenure and are freeholders, or by base tenure and are copyholders. Once only free men held freehold land and only villeins held by copy, but at the time we are speaking of all that had passed away; a gentleman might hold copyhold as well as freehold¹. The freehold tenants paid, it will be seen, a rent, and so for the matter of that did the customary tenants, and it all added together in Middleton came to sixty-two shillings and sixpence. Long before this, the customary tenants or copyholders performed certain services, which were considered unworthy of a free man, in return for their land, and that was why their tenure was termed base, but this had all disappeared, and both freeholder and copyholder¹ paid money for their land. That is to say, they were supposed to. Practically corn was often taken instead, because there was not much money in use at all. What each man in the manor had to give for his land was put down in a large volume or roll, called the court roll, and the copyholder's only title to his land was a copy which he had of the part in the roll which concerned him. From its convenience, as we shall see directly, this title to land was used in other cases.

¹ It was not till the present century that a similar change was entirely effected in Germany. Everyone has read of Burgher lands and so on.

Below the ordinary proceeds of the manor will be noted a heading, perquisitiones curiarum, &c., which means perquisites from courts and other casualties, a sort of drag-net which landed one large fish and a good many small ones. In every manor there were two courts held, the court baron or court of the freeholders of the manor, and a customary court or court of the copyholders. These courts are important when the history of the administration of justice is under investigation, but they are important for other purposes. They were in fact an important source of revenue to the lord. Any copyholder who wished to sell his holding to some one else had to pay a fine to the lord of the manor, and also had to pay whenever there was a change of ownership, as by death. In some manors no fee simple estate in copyhold was possible as we know it, the tenements being held for what we would call renewable lives, forcing the tenant to beg, as it were, for a new grant of his land when his predecessor died. All this was carried on in the customary court. In the court baron, long before this, things had been managed much in the same way; the consent of the lord had to be bought for each transfer. But it had had a meaning at a very much earlier period than the proceedings in the customary court, where tenants before Edward the Fourth's time were really tenants at will; and the consequence was that the payments were very small and not perhaps always demanded. Besides these payments in court there were other little customary receipts, such as the sheaves we noticed when speaking of one of the chantries¹; and at Middleton, taken altogether, these payments amounted to 6s. 8d.

It may be asked what is the item 'fines terrarum ibidem,' which appears to yield 30s. at Westowe and yet is not found at all here? These words refer to a custom, a great bar to accurate statistics, of accepting or rather demanding a certain sum of money down in consideration of giving a man a long lease, or a low-rented lease, or perhaps any lease of land at all. The reason why it does not appear here is that at Westowe there was 49s. 10d. worth of land let on lease, whereas at Middleton the rent of it was but 12s. Still a fine might have been expected for even so small a lease as that.

As to the effect of the dissolution on all this. Thorold Rogers places the date of the introduction of rack-renting, as a system, at the beginning of the sixteenth century¹; certainly everything favoured the rack-renter. The leases were usually short², and there is no doubt that fines were practically unknown in the fifteenth century³. The advance in this item is enormous and is reflected in the complaint of Fish. From being only a present, a fine came to be regarded as a serious burden to the incoming tenant; and of necessity, when competition began to work on rents with the increasing population, rents were lowered and future generations, for whose benefit the fine would rarely be invested, were defrauded. The system of fines tended however to fixity of tenure, indeed the time when it was usually exacted was on renewal. The writer of the Coles MS. XII. in the British Museum relates that the monks took no fines and raised no rent. If they took no fine or took but a small one, and let largely by the stock and land lease, it would seem to imply that the tenants were poorer than those on other estates, and hence, it seems to me, the great outcry soon after the dissolution. The enclosures (in the sense of making a number of small holdings into one large one) received every encouragement by the ejectment of the small farmers who, when the stock had been sold and a fine required every renewal, would be easily rooted out. What is known as an 'easy landlord' proverbially has bad tenants, and if the conditions on monastic estates were more comfortable than those on others, it only meant an anomalous and backward, rather than an ideal, state of things is indicated¹.

What system of leasing prevailed? The stock and land lease had died out simply because the land had become more valuable at a much greater rate than the stock upon it, though the ratio was probably not what it is now². The form of lease was much what it is now, as will be seen from the illustrations, but leases were made in other ways than we employ. To begin with, writing was unnecessary³, but no late monastic leases would be made without the evidence of a deed. We find, however, from FitzJames' letter as to Glastonbury⁴, and from the complaint of Fish, that leases were often made by copy of court roll. This was a convenient method. Everything that went on in a manor was entered there; the changes in the copyholders, who after all are but demesne tenants, and the changes of freeholders. In fact nothing is more probable than that this method, which was used at Glastonbury, was also employed at other houses.

Nothing is more certain than that the dissolution had the most important influence in popularising and extending leasehold tenure in England. In spite of Quia Emptores, or perhaps because of it, and in spite of all the old difficulties of tenure, most of the richer agriculturalists owned their land in the fifteenth century. It was only otherwise with those who had monastic lands. Why then did the system spread? It did so for three reasons, so far as can be gathered. In the first place because a great many owners made a compulsory acquaintance with its advantages¹. In the second because it is a tenure which, if not abused, and while land culture is in the hands of comparatively poor men, is eminently convenient. A more subtle reason for its extension is to be found in the decay of the feudal tenures so rapidly proceeding.

As to the first. It seems that long leases were at first confined to the religious bodies. In the xvth century they were granted by the convents in considerable numbers owing to a well grounded fear of coming trouble². It is said sometimes that a fraudulent advantage was taken of the system of fines, and long terms consequently taken at a low rent³, but there does not seem much proof of this⁴ so far as can be gathered from the conventual leases in the Record Office, but still that it was an idea of the period may be gathered from the elaborate provisions in the dissolution Act upon the subject of the alienations which preceded the general confiscation¹. These acts of confiscation, however, provided for the general recognition of the leases that had been honestly entered into², and this was the secret of a great multitude of land-owners becoming acquainted with this mode of holding.

Once known, it spread as its advantages were recognized. The grasping, it is to be feared, found in it an opportunity of oppressing, and it saved the small gentry the trouble of cultivating their own land. Further, leasehold property began to assume in lay hands what it had long had in the eyes of ecclesiastics, a great deal more importance. And yet at the same time the difference now began to be strongly marked between freehold and leasehold property. Mr Thorold Rogers has³ indicated this point with perfect clearness: he points out that “there was little difference between a term-inable and a perpetual lease, as far as the charge on the lessee was concerned, and that the real difference, discovered later on⁴, when the money value of a fee farm rent was seen to be

“fixed, and that of a renewable lease was seen to “be elastic, lay in the precarious nature of the “latter.”

That this was used to the detriment of the lessee there is no doubt, but the introduction of leases as a general and flexible form of ownership and as differing from the holder at a fee farm rent, was an important step in the economic history of this country.

Further, leaseholds not only became common on lay estates, taking the place, as Fish complains, of the old customary tenures, but leaseholding became at once improved. When the abbey lands passed into lay hands, it was seen that the benefits of the covenants contained in the old leases did not pass to the man who had taken the place of the convent. As lawyers would say, the benefit of the covenants (for payment of rent proper, farming and the like) did not run with the reversion. To remedy this we have 32 Hen. VIII. cap. 34. The mere fact that this act was necessary goes far, one would think, to shew that long leases were not commonly used by lay owners before the Reformation. In the case of short ones the remedy is in the new landlord's own hands while, as there was no assigning of conventual reversions, such did not require any Act, both parties being by the undying nature of a corporation privy to the deed.

As to the decay of the feudal system, that had been patent enough for some time back. The time of the wars of the Roses may be said to have been the last period when the theory of tenures was a complete working whole. In Henry the Eighth's day the incidents were but an excuse for the collection of small sums of money from time to time. But as the feudal tenures lost their reality, we may be quite sure that they lost their popularity, if they ever had any admirers. And leasehold would, seeing that demesnes could be leased by a lord and all freeholds by a freeholder, or copyholds by a copyholder, come as a welcome relief from the effects of the Statute of Quia Emptores.

So much for the effects of the dissolution so far as concerns Leaseholds. We turn now to the other parts of the manor, the effect of the same series of events on the freeholder at a quit-rent and on the copyholder. But before doing so, it would be well to glance at Fish's remarks upon Tenure published just after the dissolution had been accomplished.

"And no merueil for ther is in sted of these sturdy beggers, crept in a sturdy sorte of extortioners. These men cesse not to oppresse us your highnes pore comons in such sort that many thousandes of us, which here before lyued honestly upon our sore labour and trauayl bryngyng up our children in the exercise of honest labore are now constrayned some to begge some to borowe and some to robbe and steale to get food for us and our poore wyves and children. And that whych is most lyke to growe to inconvenience, we are constrayned to suffer our chyldren to spend the flour of theyr youth in idleness, bringyng them up other to bear wallettes, other eles if thei be sturdy to stuffe prisons, and garnish gallow trees. For such of us as have no possessions left to us by oure predicessours and elders departed this lyfe, can nowe get no ferme tennement or cottage at these men's handes without we paye unto theim more then we are able to make: yea, this was tollerable so long as after this extreme exaction we wer not for the residue of our yeares oppressed with much greater rentes then hath of ancient tyme bene paied for the same groundes, for than a man myght within few yeres be able to recouer his fyne and afterwarde lyue honestly by hys trauel. But now these extortioners haue so improved theyr landes that they make of xl s fyne. xl pounce, and of v nobles rent v pound, yea not suffised with this oppression within theyr owne inheritaunce: they buy at your highnes hand such abbay landes as you appoint to be sold. And when they stand ones seased therein they make us your pore comons so in dout of their threatynges that we dare do none other but bring into their courtes: our copies taken of the couents of the late dissolved monasteries, and confirmed by youre hygh court of Parliament, thei make us beleue that by the vertue of your highnes sale all our former writynges are voyde and of none effect And that if we wil not take new leases of them, we must then furthwith avoid the groundes as having therin none entrey.

“Moreover, when they can espy no commodious thyng to be boughte at your highnes hand: thei labour for and optayne certayne leases for xxi yeres, in and upon such abbay landes as lye commodiously for them. Then do they dashe us out of countenance with your highnes authorite, makyng us beleue that by the vertue of your highnes leas, our copies are voyde, so that they compell us to surrender al our former writings wherby we ought to holde some for ii and some for iii lyves and to take by indenture for xxi yeres, ouering both fynes and rentes beyonde all reason and conscience. This thinge causeth that suche possessioners as here tofore were able and used to mayntain theyr owne chyl dren, and, some of ours, to lernyng and such other qualities as are necessarye to be had in this your highnes royaulme, are now of necessitye compelled to set theyr owne children to labour, and al is lytle inough to pay the lordes rent and to take the house anew at the end of the yeres, so that we your poore commons which haue no groundes, nor are able to take any at these extorsioners handes can fynd no way to set our chyl dren on worke no though we profer them for meat and drink and poore clothes to cover their bodies¹!”

The freeholders of the manors cannot have felt the change of lords very much; they could not be injured particularly, their rents being certain. This is the class, the only class perhaps, which flourished throughout the period, for the simple reason that their rents had become fixed when land was at its lowest in comparison with stock, and every year tended to make them more nominal. The result has been that, though it is perfectly well known all over England who the owner of a piece of land is, it is not by any means certain who the lord of every manor may be, and this notwithstanding the fact that to be lord once meant as much as to be an owner. More, if we use the word owner in our sense of freeholder, as the lord was a branch higher in the feudal tree.

Still, as may be surmised from Fish's remarks, those who took abbey manors did their best to improve their position. In Harrison's description of England, a work which appeared in 1587, many notes of discontent are to be found when a chance occurs of saying anything of the land system of the country. Thus¹, in the chapter on the poor, one of his classes of paupers consists of idle beggars made poor by others' covetousness, of whom he says:

"Idle beggars are such either through other men's occasion or through their owne default. By other mens occasion (as one waie for example), when some covetous man, (such I meane as have the cast or right veine, dailie to make beggars inough wherby to pester the land,) espieng a further commoditie in their commons, holds, and tenures, doth find such meanes as thereby to wipe manie out of their occupiengs and turn the same unto his private gaines. Hereupon it followeth, that although the wise and better minded (doo either forsake the realme for altogether, and seeke to live in other countries, as France, Germanye, Barbarie, India, Moscouia, and verie Calecute, complaining of no roome to be left for them at home,) doo so behaue themselues that they are worthilie to be accompted among the second sort; yet the greater part, commonlie hauing nothing to staie upon, are wilfull; and thereupon doo either prooue idle beggers or else continue starke theeves till the gallows do eat them up, [which is a lamentable case.]”

This suggests one of the discomforts to the small freeholder at all events, which was accentuated by the dissolution and has already been touched upon in another connection, The Enclosure of Commons. A sample will be seen of what happened in many places in the example set by the king at West-monkton¹. It is quite a mistake to suppose that it began with the dissolution, or even with the sixteenth century, the necessities of wool-growing of the fifteenth having suggested it long before². Fitzherbert complains of it in his description of a manor. But that it was inevitable there is no manner of doubt, though there was no reason why, like the profits of so many other economic changes, the value of the enclosure all went one way. Common of pasture is but one of several kinds of common; all commons are a legacy from the system of village ownership, which gradually became impossible. There were fewer impossibilities or inconveniences attaching to common of pasture than to the others (common of piscary, turbary, wood), and so it lasted longer, but in its most extensive form there is no doubt that, standing alone, it would have proved a serious obstacle to the improvement of agriculture.

From J. Norden's account¹, in the form of a dialogue, it is plain that the difficulty as to enclosure was a burning question in 1608, but by that time there was less vagueness as to the lord's rights, and this vagueness had been one secret of his earlier power. Harrison, before his time, has a hint on the subject²: "And yet some owners still desirous to inlarge "those grounds [as either for the breed and feeding "of cattell,] do not let dailie to take in more, [not "sparing the verie commons whereupon many towne-ships now and then doo live]."

We may take the term enclosure in either of the two senses in which it was used³: either, that is to say, as meaning the hedging in the separate plots of land, or as throwing open a large tract for a sheep run. In each case the process had begun before the effects of the dissolution could possibly have been felt. In each case the change was an economic necessity, and in each case again we can say with certainty that the dissolution made the change more easy to accomplish. That the change was cruelly carried out is quite clear; it is not merely the cry of the poor, but of the rich. No one, even in the sixteenth century, who examined the matter at all carefully could doubt that the hedging in of separate parcels of ground was for the general advantage; but the other kind of enclosure, the abolition of rights of common whether for pasture or tillage, excited much more indignation, and even now it is not uncommon to read suggestions that the more primitive form of land-tenure was of greater national advantage. But I cannot think so. With the growing unreality of copyhold tenure the common system slowly became an anachronism. It has always prevented the free transfer of land. It would, if preserved, have tended to conserve the notion that England was an agricultural country, and by fixing the population have proved a bar to that movement, which has not been the least important civilising agent. It may be objected that the change is somewhat of a sham, which drives people from their homes, pauperizes and often kills them by starvation for the sake of a future which none of them would live to see, but economic changes are always times of misery, and most will allow that the changes reduced the amount of villeinage. It is not quite correct, surely, to say either that enclosures raised rents¹. The rents rose, no doubt, from many causes; harsher landlords, the fall in the value of money, and the better management of an estate, as a business, must be taken into account.

The preamble of 3 and 4 Edw. VI. cap. 3, suggests that there was great ill-feeling on the subject²: in fact, it has been a sore point between lord and tenant from Henry the Seventh's day down to our own.

The effects of the dissolution upon the customary tenures must have been slight. It is not till the middle of the seventeenth century that there was any further great change in the nature of the copyholder's interest. The incidents were gradually being commuted by that time, where possible, for money payments. Still, one or two points can be suggested on this most important topic in the history of English Law. In the first place, the reason for there being so little change was obviously to be found in the excellent condition of the monastic court rolls. Nothing can be clearer than the accounts of a monastery¹, and this perhaps is the reason why the Receiver's accounts are also so intelligible. Now, when the ministers took the place of the monks as collectors of the manorial payments, they had complete lists of these payments to hand, and it is only where they were wanting perhaps that any change occurred.

A list of the Glastonbury fines for instance is extant, by which the receivers could verify all after payments². Of course where possible the tenants took advantage of any casual circumstances which might turn to their advantage; the loss of the court roll would be one of these circumstances. In a manuscript³, presumably of Henry VIIIth's time, we read :

¹ See for instance a roll of Taunton Priory lands, B. M. Add. 16, 333, for the reign of Hen. VI.

² Brit. Mus. Add. MSS. 17451.

³ Harl. 604. This MS. however looks as though it were of later date than the above. The writing is like that of the Stuart period.

"After the dissolution of the Abbey of Glas-tonbury the manor of Ditchet in Somerset was "granted (as I take it) to Sir Raph Hopton "Knight Marshall.

"Now the point I desire to be resolved in is "what the custom of the copyholds was in the "Abbot's time because the tenants have usurped "a new custom since."

Again as to manors as a whole, it is difficult to say what the general result was to the tenant. Rogers¹ says that the monks were easy landlords, because they were unpopular, a rather unkind suggestion. It seems probable that they were such, whatever the reason, or the new owners could not have raised the rents of the leaseholders as they did². Fish, in the quoted portion of his supplication, gives a very strong and circumstantial account of the proceedings of the landed classes³. The lease for life or lives⁴, the intimidation, the surrender of the copy, and the re-grant of a shorter lease only renewed after paying an extortionate fine. But the Receivers do not seem to have pressed hardly on the tenants. From Somerset accounts it will be seen that they allowed very large arrears to accumulate.

Amos, in his work on the Statutes of Henry VIII., has drawn attention to one or two points too important to be passed by without some notice. The locking up of land in the hands of a corporation was an immense bar to the free circulation of estates as marketable commodities. This the dissolution removed. Another consequence of almost equal importance was the immediate necessity for land legislation. A glance at the statute roll of Henry VIII., Edw. VI., Mary and Elizabeth, will shew what a number of Acts were passed dealing with the tenure, descent, and transfer of estates. These Acts cannot be dealt with in a work of a professedly local character. The 'Protestant title to lands,' a doctrine of some importance in the sixteenth century, must be also left. Something will be found about it in Hallam.

We have just stated that a very large amount of land was suddenly let loose among the laity, and if land were subject to the rules which govern other commodities, we would expect the value of land to fall because there was so much in the market. In Somerset about a fourth of the cultivated land of the county was in religious hands, and most of it passed out of the Crown's hands before twenty years were past. The following corrections must be borne in mind. The King did not grant it all at once, a matter of some importance. Again the land did not, as for instance the land of the noblesse in France after the Revolution, go to enrich land merchants. Those who bought bought to keep and not to sell again. So even more so of those who received a free grant. The Sydenhams, Sir John Seyntlo, Francis, the Luttrells, Seymour, the Earl of Suffolke, and the Earl of Wiltshire, were not land jobbers, and the passing of a great mass of property into such hands would tend in Somerset, as in the rest of England, to correct the market.

But when all this discount is allowed the effect must still have been enormous. We are told, as has been said, by Rogers that rack-renting commenced with the sixteenth century. The reason in the earlier part of the century was obvious enough, being the rapid rise in general prices accompanied by no corresponding improvement in agriculture. Consequently when the landlord raised the rent in proportion to the rise of other prices he found his tenant unable to pay¹. The fact was that the price of stock, as compared with that of the land itself, was still too great. But this must have righted itself to a certain extent, had not the great quantity of land thrown upon the market delayed what may be called the settlement of the value of land. This was again what delayed for a time the rise in rents. The increase of leaseholds must have helped, for the number of tenants cannot have been very large when they had been redistributed, and the tendency towards sheep farming had spread over the kingdom. But there is certainly no doubt about the result; the rise in rents, which ought to have come towards the end of the sixteenth century, was delayed until the beginning of the seventeenth, because then land culture was improved without the price of the articles needed for production being perceptibly increased².

From the Acts of Parliament, if nothing else, it is evident that a good deal of buying and selling of land went on whatever might be the intention of the monastic grantees. The price of land is, it is confessed by a master of statistics, very difficult to discover, indeed, from the calculation by produce and the complex character of the interests in land at the time, almost impossible to discover¹. The valor never states the acreage, and though the rental does in many cases it was taken at the beginning of Edward VI.'s reign, and is perplexing from the variations of rent that are met with. Take the following :

² An account of the delay is in Thor. Rog. Six Cents. of Work and Wages, p. 351.

	Rent.			Value.
	s.	d.		£.	s.	d.
At North Petherton,
meadow land	1	0	per acre, capitalized	1	0	0
At Langford, land...	0	6	„	0	10	0
At Kingston, land	2	0	„	2	0	0
At Dundre, land ...	0	4	„	0	6	8
At Yatton, meadow	1	8	„	1	13	4
At Portebury, pasture	1	0	„	1	0	0

Still in the beginning of Edward's reign for average pasture land a shilling an acre would be usual and for meadow 1s. 8d. Kingston is in the vale of Taunton, which was even then termed 'paradise,' and the explanation of other differences in the rental may be accounted for by supposing that much less land was carefully cultivated than at the present day. In giving up the attempt to determine the price of land save by a rude system of capitalizing rental at twenty years' purchase, it must be remembered that the king's grants are no reliable list.

They were often prepared on surveys, but the way in which they were sought for¹ shows that they were obtained at a far lower price than they were worth. But thus much we may be sure of, that the above prices are not in anything like the same ratio to the prices of labour and produce that prevailed either before the sixteenth century or after it. Mowing was sixpence per acre in 1530, one and sixpence in 1580, and a penny higher shortly after the beginning of the seventeenth century². This rise ought to have been accompanied by a great increase in rent³, but the rise was not in correspondence, and the reason was mainly, perhaps, because of the failure until the last mentioned date to effect much improvement in agricultural methods, but also because of the large amount of land open to tenant-farmers⁴ at a lease, and the consequent absence of competition as an element forcing the price of land above what could be paid. Before our period the wage was much the same, but the ratio of it to the price of land represented the greater percentage of the labourer's share and his consequently greater comfort³.

Although great estates passed into a few hands, such was the number and wealth of the religious houses in the county of Somerset that a very wide distribution took place, and in consequence a large addition to the class of landed proprietors in the counties. This has been illustrated before ; perhaps the following will suffice here :

Taunton Priory enjoyed an income which may be roughly estimated at two thousand pounds a year of our money, though in relation to food it would probably amount to more than that sum. The land producing this revenue went among the following. The site and demesne lands situated in Taunton, Bishop's Hull, Staplegrove, Russheton, Trull, Corfe, Pitminster, Church, Hill Farance, Norton, Kingston and Cheddon, were divided between Sir Francis Bryan and Matthew Coltehurst¹. Many small properties in Taunton were given to Wm. Chapleyn and John Selwood². Popham and Halley were satisfied by messuages at Playsneto, the manor of To-bridge, and fields about Thurlebeere and Hatch. Humphrey Coles³, a name too familiar in this connection, had the Rectory of Pitminster, and that of Corfe with lands all round that neighbourhood, including Barton Orange. Staffordell was divided between Sir Richard Zouche, Sir Thomas Arundell, and the Earl of Oxford. Three other names, Standyshe, Hill and Eyre, complete the list of grantees⁴. Thus what had been the subject of one ownership becomes at once divided among 13, and probably

³ Ib. 125.

was soon afterwards still further split up. A rough estimate would give as the area so distributed 2000 acres.

Mynchin Buckland was the only important nunnery in the county, and it will be found to have been grasped by no less than 22 grantees¹, among whom was Popham, an officer of the convent. Canyngton was a small priory and a good many of its possessions were leased on easy terms. Some 13 new proprietors in one way or another appear however, among whom Hugo notes 'the insatiate Edward Rogers,' and there also appears the equally insatiate Humphrey Coles. A similar partition among half-a-dozen occurred at Barrow Gurney.

Thus where there had been four corporations as owners there at once spring up over fifty proprietors, and of course in the case of Glastonbury far more than this proportion. There must then have been a very wide distribution of land.

CHAPTER VIII.

SOME GENERAL RESULTS OF THE SUPPRESSION.

IN gathering up a few of the results of the suppression not hitherto noticed, the survey will be found to be invaluable, and the hints which it gives ought to be most carefully noted. It was taken just when the effect of the suppression was beginning to make itself fully felt, in the social life of the county at all events. The first point then that we must examine is the condition of what may be termed religion after the overthrow of the monks.

The monastic chapels are all gone, some of them splendid, many of them places of resort for the neighbours, though it is highly improbable that the monks ever systematically worked as parish priests. In the time of Henry the Eighth there was a great deal of slackness about religion. Traces of it will be seen in the survey; the businesslike way in which districts bargained for their services is almost amusing. When then the monasteries went a certain definite amount of religious accommodation went too. The chantries were left, but were often in decay, often small; and again, invaluable though they were in the country on other than religious grounds, they were suppressed at the beginning of Edward the VI.'s reign. To illustrate the need of more services take the following :

The ffree chapell of Blackeforde.

The saide chapell is distant from the paryshe churche one myle and a half, and thenhabitauntes ther be xxxiiij households¹.

Chuton : The chapell of Eston Minor.

This chapell maye welbe spared for that Eston Maior standeth within ij furlonge, and nerer the towne².

Ilchester Burrowe : The free chapell of the Holy Trinity of Whitehall ther.

The chapell is scituate within the towne of Ilchester.

The chapell of Upton.

The chapell is half a myle from the paryshe church and maye well be spared.

The chapell of Knolle.

The chapell is a quarter of a myle from the paryshe church and maye well be spared.

There be no lands apperteyning to this chapell⁴.

These instances will shew that there was need of the churches, and that the destruction of these chapels and confiscation of the endowments would only add to the existing religious ignorance. That in the early part of the sixteenth century there was a certain amount of religious devotion among the laity, the churches which are of that period afford evidence. It was a time of considerable building activity. The Chantry Inspectors' reports shew that there had been generosity and self-sacrifice on the part of the people. For instance :

Stavordall.

The personage and vicarage ther wer impropriet to the late priorye of Staverdell and after the dissolution of the same purchased by the foresaide Lord Zouche of the kinges ma^{tie}, who findeth a curate to mynyster ther having for his yerely salarie. vjli.

³ Ib. p. 86.

But on the other hand there is no doubt that the effects of the frequent changes and turmoils of the reign had proved disastrous to religious observances by the time that Edward the Sixth came to the throne. To begin with, a man would be in great danger of being an Act of Parliament behind the King in times when no dissent was tolerated. Cautious men of the period would wait, or at all events be chary of making loud professions on matters of ritual. Probably a great deal less church-going went on. For all this the dissolution must in some part answer; but surely the pre-Reformation teaching has a good deal of responsibility. The men of the Reformation were the creatures of the time of Catholic supremacy, and the abuse which is freely and with a certain amount of justice employed in describing their characters has a certain reference to those by whom they were educated. And it is curious that those who had most to do with the dissolution of monasteries were all more or less connected with the religious system of the time. There is not much doubt that as to the religious side of the Reformation most people cared little, they were indeed throughout Henry's reign very little concerned with it. They had long hated the Pope as represented to the ordinary mind by the extortioners of the ecclesiastical courts and the changes in ritual were slight. The survey throws a good deal of indirect light on the state of religious feeling when it was taken as well as being a witness of many acts of sacrilege¹.

Pytney.

The chapell is utterly decayde and fallen downe longe ago².

The last is a common report.

Of those that occur above as places where the Commissioners thought that the chapels might be used as parish churches with advantage, Knolle was erected into a chapel of Long Sutton³, but none of the other recommendations seem to have been attended to.

But all this, though it shews a certain decay in religious observances, really hardly touches the religious houses at all. The chapel of the monastery was in all but the greatest houses the chapel of the monks. The people might go occasionally from the district, but the great lesson of the accounts of the churchwardens⁴ before referred to is that England was centred in the parish churches and not in the monasteries. Little aid came from monasteries to the village churches in the parishes from which their income was drawn. As a rule they left the church poorer from the system now to be noticed.

We turn to a consequence of the dissolution for which the religious themselves were in no small measure to blame, and if they had wished to leave a curse to the temporal prosperity of those that should come after them, they could not have devised a more fruitful source of annoyance and poverty than the system of impropriations. Kennet¹ says that the poverty of the country clergy was so great that most of them in Henry the VIII.'s time took to farming, and were very much alarmed when the statute of 21 Hen. VIII. seemed to prevent them from leasing land of the convents any longer. But one finds it difficult to believe this. Kennet was a man with a case to prove, and as far as Somerset is concerned there seems evidence to the contrary from the survey, where the values of the livings are often enumerated. Further we have the evidence of the Valor which shews that the vicar had enough for a single man to live on. Not a large income but more than Kennet would have us believe, or else, in the stagnation period of rent which followed and the small improvement in agriculture, the vicar could never have paid his first-fruits and tenths at all, more particularly as he was deprived by statute of part of a small augmentation often accruing. All the historians of the time consider the parson to have been fairly well off. We find a vicar keeping two curates in the survey. From the valor a vicar would appear to get some six pounds a year, but he often got more than that, and sometimes, as appears from the survey, he had his food or wood as well. Fish laments the wealth rather than poverty of the clerics¹. In the diocese of Bath and Wells there were 125 rectories appropriated before the dissolution. Most of these were in the hands of the convents, an example of which may be seen in the Taunton accounts, the Austin canons there having the Rectory of Dulverton. But others besides convents were in possession of appropriated rectories before the Reformation. It was a very favourite method of paying a man a salary to make him a non-resident rector of a country living. He put in a vicar and drew the difference between the whole tithe and whatever the vicar had to live upon, generally the small tithe. The chancellor of the diocese, the prebendaries, the archdeacon and others received money in this way; and sometimes laymen. Also when the visitations were in progress and during the troubled years between the various stages of the suppression, the convents in order to bribe or please certain of their friends made grants of rectories to laymen, but the practice was not at all common and was considered illegal. But when the monastic property changed hands a very different state of affairs presented itself. The laity who held land in manors formerly the property of a convent very naturally objected to pay large sums of money amounting in our values almost always² to several hundred pounds to other than religious persons, and it appears that they did not pay until admonished so to do by the Act of 32 Hen. VIII. on the subject. One computation assigns 3335 as the number of rectories which passed into lay hands¹.

² See the valor tit. Dioc. Bathon' and Wellen'.

Here all that can be said on the subject is that a wrong was done to the clergy such as has caused poverty and often the necessary consequence of ill living, from the sixteenth century to our own day; a far more grievous wrong was done to the poor whose position might have been considered, and who certainly had some sort of vested interest in the tithe which the very constitution of the monasteries recognized; and further the last chance was lost of shewing some little unselfishness in the disposition of that uttermost farthing which "the gang of coiners and smashers"² of the court seemed determined to exact. From that day to this parishes have been impoverished by the paying away of large and now almost unvarying sums of money to persons who have often no other local interests, while the vicar, whose income has certainly not increased with either the demands upon his pocket or the necessities of the parish for which he is thought an ex-officio relieving officer, finds himself very differently situated in 1890 to what he was in 1530. Then he was often a monk, and whether that or not was never rack-rented by the brethren of the convent in paying the great tithe; he had moreover a fair stipend. Now it is enough to say that he is married, poor, and expected to be a country gentleman, to express what is often the wretchedness of his position.

Every record we have of the customs of mediaeval England points to the fact that it was a very musical period. The English were always great lovers of song. Anything with a tune in it, catches, rounds, solos on the organs, or, if nothing better, bells. Thus they relieved their feelings which then had much fewer ways of escape than in the highly strung times we live in.

We may be quite sure that the monks enjoyed themselves in much the same ways as the rest of the world; no one either demanded or found any special standard of self-denial for the religious above that of Christian men and women around them. It will be remembered how the musical man at Athelney enjoyed peculiar privileges¹, and how at another place the priest of a chantry is praised for being a good singing-man; the choir boys were taught to play on the organs and the simple psalm tunes were learned by all the youth of the district. Music was very much the property of the church in those days. There were no glees², the opera had not been invented or revived in Italy. It certainly is true that the music of the orders was greatly enjoyed, as may be seen from the testimony of friends and foes. The singing of the nuns, quotes Fosbrooke³, was exquisite. Erasmus has a well-known sneer at the elaborateness of the church music of his day. All the most eminent of the school of contrapuntists wrote almost entirely for the church¹. The singing² was of course slightly different to that we are accustomed to, and the music was of course elementary. Gregorians were universal for the Psalms, a method which required more care than skill, especially as but few chants were used. Rhymed psalms the Reformation period gave birth to, at least they are never found in use before it³. Hymns in rhythm but not rhyme were also sung, and to the monks is entirely due the rise of the oratorio. This came clearly from incidental music used at mystery plays and at the various saturnalia which the convents indulged in⁴. But it may be very reasonably doubted whether the parish churches had not a fair share in the honour of musical invention.

After the Reformation hymnology became more common, and was better adapted for the people; singing became congregational, but the sphere of music in the Church became more limited. England also was in musical connection with the continent, and the opera there and the new school of Monteverde there, and its immense popularity must with

² Fish, who grumbles at everything, had no great love for the pre-Reformation Church Music. In the Supplication of the Poore Commons he writes :

‘Nowe (i.e. before the dissolution) can we not denye but ‘that the outragious belowing of a sort of Sodimitical buls, ‘myngled with the proud pipying of organs: is the Service of ‘God, and worthy to be preferred before the redying & preach‘ing of God’s worde.’

the generally laicising effect of the change on all things hitherto regarded as sacred have tended to take music from the cloister to the street¹.

Indeed in England after the Reformation, along with bell-ringing, altars and the like, it is questionable whether music was not among "things superstitious." A contemporary, Case, whose work on "The praise of Musicke" appeared in 1586, thus writes on the subject:—

Now although there be none but few men so senselesse and blockish by nature, or of disposition so peevish, and waiward, that taking no delight in musick themselves, and measuring the worth and price thereof, by their own affections, do account of it as a thing either vain and unlawful, or idle and unprofitable, yet there be many, who albeit they allow a moderate, and sober use of it in civil matters: do notwithstanding cast it out of the church, as an uncleane thing, and will vouchsafe it no place in the service of God².

He then proceeds to shew that it has been used in religious ceremonies for all time, and also that the opinions of those whom he terms 'the doctours,' meaning the fathers, were favourable to church music. He has, as in duty bound, a word as to the monks, of whom he perhaps knew several, as he appears from Wood³ to have had some Roman Catholic pupils at Oxford.

¹ Rockstro, chap. x. That this was so may be gathered from the small amount of secular music which remains from the pre-Reformation times. Cp. Chappell, Pop. Mus. vol. i. pp. 55, 98.

³ Ath. Ox. Ed. Bliss, vol. i. p. 686.

Now if we consider to what end the custom of singing was used, we shall perceive that it was not so used, as that singing and the sounding of organs, should be a deed meritorious, to obtaine remission of sinnes and life eternall (as the Jewes imagine of their songs, and the heathen of their sonnets) or as the hypocriticall monkes and friers sang their seven canonicall houres that the doing of that work, whether with understanding, or without understanding, it was not materiall yet the bare performance of it should be meritorious for the sinnes of the quicke and the dead: but so, that the Lord might decently be praised, whether with humble and harty prayer, as in the time of heaviness: or with singing of Psalmes, and playing on instrumentes, as in the time of joy and mirth, according to that counsell of the Apostle, If any man bee afflicted let him pray, and if any man be merry let him sing Psalmes¹.

Out of 152 pages in his little book Case devotes 62 to the controversy as to church music, shewing clearly that the spirit of the Reformed Church was opposed to it.

The whole service was made more dreary². It must have been so seeing the war that began against all that was beautiful in internal decoration¹. We have seen that that crusade in Somersetshire became a simple extermination a levelling of all the beautiful monastery chapels and chantries in the county. Who can say that there did not set in a corresponding ebb tide in the value of things religious in the estimation of the laity? A priest became the humdrum rustic that Macaulay has described, droning out once a week his humdrum service. The altar became the "oyster board," the gorgeous processions were exchanged for the sleepy sermon. All this would now, in the days of libraries, theatres and pictures, be thought but little of if the civilization of the people were looked to. But in the latter part of the 16th century it can never be too often repeated the Church and its services were the only elements of beauty which, apart from the enjoyment of natural objects, ever affected the peasant's life. The way was fast prepared for the Eighteenth century when comfort was the key-note of all life including church life, and every aspiration after an artistic life in the English country houses was checked by over-eating, over-drinking and the utter absence of educated taste among any, the high or the low.

From the interior to the exterior is an easy transition. The effects of the dissolution are manifest on architecture as they are on the services of the

Church. The perpendicular style culminated during the hundred years preceding the middle of the fifteenth century, and whether it were a consequence or an accident the hundred years that followed witnessed a steady decline in public taste. This of ecclesiastical buildings. The fifteenth century had seen builded all those perpendicular towers which give Somerset an individuality in ecclesiology; they as much as the internal history of the Abbeys themselves are an ample refutation to the charge of architectural slackness which has been brought against the immediately pre-Reformation period. The plenitude of churches was such that after the Reformation none of any importance in the country were erected for at least a hundred years¹. This was fortunate for Somerset for it was thereby saved from the consequences of that declining taste in matters architectural which has just been alluded to. It seems as though there never was a thoroughly English Renaissance style for churches and hence the weakness and unartistic form of those that do exist. This was probably again due to the fact that so few were required and those few all at once² and in one place, so that there was no opportunity for a healthy, slow and national growth to be perfected as in the English Gothic. This will readily account for the difference of the fate of the Renaissance style when employed to domestic architecture and that which it experienced in the few or at least comparatively few country churches to which it was applied. From the perpendicular period to that of the Classical revival it may be said that too few churches were built to allow of the forms they took presenting any further charm than can be found in imitative art.

But when we turn to domestic architecture we must speak rather differently. The reign of Elizabeth was a period of transition although there may have been a certain amount of Italian idea even in Henry the Eighth's time¹. But the domestic perpendicular style may during the last half of the sixteenth and beginning of the seventeenth century be said to have been perfected; that is to say as a mode of building comfortable houses. What share then had the monasteries in the transition which slowly passed into the Renaissance? Certainly some credit. All that was best and finest in the domestic architecture of the sixteenth century comes from the fifteenth, and all that is beautiful in a fifteenth century manor house comes directly from the Church. No one outside the orders knew or improved the art of architecture except as they knew or developed the conventual building. Compare the George Inn at Glastonbury or the old part of Brimpton with the priory remains at Muchelney; or again the domestic part of any Somerset manor house with the priory house at Montacute. It will be at once perceived that all that is admirable in the cinquecento comes not from the old castle but from the mediaeval monastery. In fact the introduction of the parlours and the many apartments express a higher civilization, and the monasteries supplied in this country the earliest idea of a house as differing from a fort.

But with the inspiration, went the power of development. The Church as a foundation disappears, and all the work that it performed as an artistic school of design was at an end. The 'new set' as the abbot of Athelney termed them, were doing a great deal more than they guessed when they took down the abbey roofs, even if some of them had feeling enough to regret the temporary vandalism that their work involved. All domestic architecture in England has taken its highest note from the Church, the great originator of what is beautiful. It is very unfortunate when the conditions are reversed. We shall find as in the eighteenth century that a church must be made, at the expense of carving perhaps, above all things like a comfortable dwelling house, whilst a dwelling house builder will be thrown on to the past for a model instead of continuing a style of his own, with the result of producing a bald Georgian façade, at the best a box of rooms¹.

England felt to the full though at a comparatively late period the literary effects of the revival of learning. In the rude ages the monks were the only learned men and some of them not that. But with the printing press even in its infancy and with the generally awakened interest in learning it passed into the hands of the multitude. It is one of the best things that can be said for the monks that they were not bigotedly opposed to the new movement.

The revival of learning at its inception could not be termed anything else than a clerical movement. On the Continent no one was more ready than the abbots to dethrone Thomas Aquinas. But in England the new learning was directly associated with the reformed party¹. The monasteries were no longer necessary as storehouses for learning nor did they any longer, as they used, keep the archives of great families in their neighbourhood; but they were the academies of their districts and the residences of, taking them all in all, the most leisured and cultivated class in England. Take away Cleeve for example and what a loss you at once inflict on the country gentry of that remote district! No wonder that the country life of the seventeenth century shewed so little improvement on that of the sixteenth, that it was so swinish in many of its details².

We must remember again that the monks were the only people who had regular intelligence of what went on at a distance. They were the only travelers in fact. The prior at Bath had a cell in Ireland where he bred the "laners." That must be visited. So too there would be constant intercourse between Dunster and Bath because the latter was a cell of the former. Sometimes a great official of the knights of St John would come down to Templecombe bringing news as to what was going on at the court. The official visitations involved a great deal of journeying and entertaining. The constantly varying numbers too in the houses point to a great deal of going and coming. Once in a way a messenger must go to Rome. Perhaps even the prior himself¹, the journey giving him materials for a lifetime's conversation. From Chaucer's time to Henry VIII. the monk is always one of any assembly of travellers. The friars may have been said to have been professional voyagers, compassing sea and land, 'writing' their way² where they could not pray it, and perhaps singing or wrestling for a supper when they could not otherwise get accommodation.

¹ Cf. Leyton's memorable letter from Oxford, 'We have set Duns in Bocardo,' alluding to the change the visitors had made in Oxford studies.

ILLUSTRATION.

Fish who is a jaundiced witness laments the state of religion in the closing years of Henry's reign but he imputes it mainly to the monks. However all he can find to say against the clergy is that they disapprove of the free reading of the bible and that such as he hears preach occasionally sigh for the days before the dissolution. Fish is not at all consistent in explaining the reason of things, as will have been seen in examining his remarks on the poor. But that does not make his testimony less valuable where he is bearing witness to the matters of everyday life around him. He has seen the monks go, but he is not satisfied, as the following quotation will evidence. It is directed against the king's chaplains.

² Rogers thinks that they transcribed the Court Rolls from the steward's rough notes. The writing on the former is certainly beautiful and in striking contrast to the execrable handwriting of laymen temp. Hen. VIII. But it is merely a legal as contrasted with a lay hand, and hence it seems more probable that the steward wrote his own accounts.

We beseke you (most deare souveraine) even for the hope you have in the redemption by Christ: that you call to remembraunce that dreadfull daye whan your highnesse shall stande before the judgement seat of God in no mor reputation then one of those miserable creatures which do nowe daylye dy in the stretes for lack of theyr dwe portion wherwith you and your nobles do reward those gnatonical elbowhangers your chaplaines. Yf theyr ministrie be so necessarie to your highness that you cannot lacke them: yet let not the unsatiabie dogges devour the bread that was prepared for the children let them be appointed lyvinges worthy their ministration. What reason is it that a surveyor of bildinges or landes, an alkmist, or a goldsmith, should be rewarded with benefice upon benefice, which of very reason oughte to be committed to none other but suche as throughe godly lerninge and conversation were able and would apply themselves, &c.
